The second UN resolution that a number of governments (including Israel and the U.S.) contend applies to Jewish refugees is, of course:

UN Resolution 242 (1967): Later that year, on Nov. 22, 1967, the Security Council unanimously adopted Resolution 242, laying down the principles for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East: "withdrawal of Israel armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict" and "termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force."

Resolution 242, still considered the primary vehicle for resolving the Arab-Israel conflict, stipulates that a comprehensive peace settlement should necessarily include "a just settlement of the refugee problem." An unsuccessful effort was made by the Soviet Union's UN delegation to restrict this "just settlement" only to Palestinian refugees. (S/8236, discussed by the Security Council at its 1382nd meeting of Nov. 22, 1967, notably at paragraph 117, in the words of Ambassador Kouznetsov of the Soviet Union). Justice Arthur Goldberg, the American delegate who was instrumental in drafting the unanimously adopted resolution, has pointed out that:

"A notable omission in 242 is any reference to Palestinians, a Palestinian state on the West Bank or the PLO. The resolution addresses the objective of 'achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem.' This language presumably refers both to Arab and Jewish refugees, for about an equal number of each abandoned their homes as a result of the several wars…"

Jewish claims concern not only private property but also significant community assets

The United Nations has also discussed, at great length, the issue of "refugee properties;" however, a plethora of UN resolutions have only addressed properties of Palestinian refugees. Beginning in 1948, the issue was addressed at virtually every annual meeting of the General Assembly, progressively expanding the focus on "refugee properties" of Palestinians.

However, with reference to Jewish "refugee properties," the UN, by resolution or otherwise, never affirmed as it did for Palestinians, that "compensation should be paid… by the governments or authorities responsible" (Resolution 194); never called for "assessment and payment of compensation" for Jewish property losses (as it does for Palestinian refugees in Resolution 394); did not call for an "identification and evaluation of… refugees' immovable properties" in Arab countries (as it does for Palestinian refugees in Resolution 1725); did not ask "the Secretary-General to take all appropriate steps… for the protection and administration of...property, assets and property rights" (as it does for Palestinian refugees in Resolution 36/146); nor reaffirm that Jewish refugees "be entitled to their property and to the income derived therefrom, in conformity with the principles of justice and equity" (as it does in resolution 51/129).

Moreover, unlike the Palestinians, Jewish claims concern not only private property but also significant community assets that were expropriated in many countries – synagogues, schools, community centres, cemeteries, ritual baths, etc.

In addition to the value of individual and communal properties left behind by the Jews of Arab countries, the State of Israel has spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the transport and absorption of these former refugees, most of who arrived destitute or with almost no wealth. Such amounts have to be taken into consideration in the overall evaluation of the compensation issue.

The Response of UN Agencies

Since 1947, only one UN entity – the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) – has responded to the needs of Jewish refugees from Arab countries. By contrast, numerous existing UN agencies addressed the wide-ranging needs of Palestinian refugees, including:

United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine (UNCCP): Established in December 1948 (General Assembly Resolution 194) the UNCCP was given the mandate to assist the governments and authorities concerned to achieve a final settlement of the Palestine question, and to provide protection and promote a durable solution for Palestine refugees.

United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA): Immediately after the Arab-Israeli hostilities of 1948, emergency assistance to Palestine refugees was provided by international organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross, League of Red Cross Societies and the American Friends Service Committee. On Dec. 8, 1949, the UN General Assembly adopted Resolution 302 (IV) creating UNRWA specifically for the provision of assistance to Palestinian refugees.

Today, UNRWA provides basic relief, health, education and social services to some 3.8 million people – the original refugees (UN estimate – 725,000) and their descendents. UNRWA administers 59 refugee camps in its five areas of operation – West Bank, Gaza Strip, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria – and employs more than 100 foreign nationals and 20,000 Palestinians. UNRWA operations are financed almost entirely by voluntary contributions from governments and the European Union, with United Nations bodies covering staffing costs. Its 2002 budget was $292 million (US) with another $55 million (US) for projects and an additional emergency 'relief' fund of $86 million (US).

Several other additional UN entities have subsequently been mandated to deal with the Palestinian issue, including the issue of Palestinian refugees.

- In 1974, the UN established the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People (General Assembly Resolution 3376), mandated to recommend to the General Assembly a program of implementation designed to enable the Palestinian people to exercise their inalienable rights to self-determination, to national independence and sovereignty; and to return to their homes and property from which they have been displaced and uprooted.

- In 1977, the UN established the Division for Palestine Rights (General Assembly Resolution 32/40). The Division assists in planning and organizing international meetings, preparing studies and publications relating to the issue of Palestinian and Palestinian refugees and organizing the annual commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People on Nov. 29.

- In 1994, the UN established the Office of the United Nations Special Co-ordinator for the Occupied Territories (UNSCO) to provide guidance and facilitate co-ordination among UN programs and to assist the Palestinian Authority and donors in co-ordinating international assistance. UNSCO was not established specifically to address the Palestinian refugee issue, but relates to Palestinian refugees in the West Bank and Gaza Strip as residents of the occupied territories through its mandate.

A host of other UN affiliated programs provide some level of services to Palestinian refugees. These include: the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) dealt with Palestinians who did not fall under the mandate of UNRWA; the Joint United Nations Program on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS), the United Nations Development Program (UNDP), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and the World Health Organization (WHO).

As noted earlier, the sole UN body that has dealt with the needs of a segment of those Jews fleeing from Arab countries was the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Beginning in 1957 and continuing through to the early 1970s, the UNHCR undertook significant initiatives, trying to expedite the transfer of assets after Jews had resettled in new countries of residence. However, notwithstanding good intentions, the protection and rehabilitation provided to Jewish refugees by the UNHCR did not even represent a miniscule fraction of the overwhelming support provided by the international community to Palestinian Arab refugees.

JEWISH REFUGEES FROM ARAB COUNTRIES: THE CASE FOR RIGHTS AND REDRESS

Jews from Arab Countries and the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process

It would be an injustice to ignore, in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, the rights of Jews from Arab countries. It would be a distortion of history, and would constitute a fundamental inequity, to recognize a right in Palestinian refugees to redress without recognizing a right to redress for Jewish refugees displaced from Arab countries. The case of displaced Jews to redress is as strong as, if not stronger than, the case of Palestinian refugees.

Yet, that is exactly what appears to be happening. Occasionally, the two sets of claims have been put on equal footing. A United Nations Security Council resolution adopted in 1967 calls for "a just settlement of the refugee problem" without distinction between Palestinian and Jewish refugees. The Camp David Framework for Peace in the Middle East of 1978 (the "Camp David Accords") includes, in paragraph A (1)(f), a commitment by Egypt and Israel to "work with each other and with other interested parties to establish agreed procedures for a prompt, just and permanent resolution of the implementation of the refugee problem" – again without distinction between Palestinian and Jewish claims. President Carter stated in a press conference in 1977 that "Palestinians have rights… obviously there are Jewish refugees… they have the same rights as others do."

But in practice that is not how things are working out. In 1991, the Madrid Peace Conference established a Multilateral Working Group on refugees. Its mandate was to "consider practical ways of improving the lot of people throughout the region who have been displaced from their homes." But as Kara Stein writes, those involved in the Working Group, "save perhaps the Israelis," view their efforts as relating to Palestinian refugees only.

Several aspects of the 1994 Israel-Jordan Peace Treaty are worth noting. The Article 8, paragraph 1, entitled "Refugees and Displaced Persons" recognizes "the massive human problems caused to both parties by the conflict in the Middle East." What is significant about this provision is that it is clearly not limited to Palestinian refugees.

While the parties commit themselves to alleviate problems on the bilateral level, they also affirm in paragraph 2, that problems "cannot be fully resolved on the bilateral level" and therefore commit themselves to seek solutions in accordance with international law "in negotiations, in a framework to be agreed, bilateral or otherwise, in conjunction with and at the same time as the permanent status negotiations…"

Reference to massive human problems in a broad manner, and the commitment of the parties to find ways to resolve these problems, suggests that the plight of all refugees of "the conflict in the Middle East," including Jewish refugees from Arab lands, was envisaged in this treaty.

To the extent that individual claims by Jewish refugees may exist against Jordan (in particular for property damaged or expropriated during the 1948-1967 period), Article 24 of the Israel-Jordan Peace Treaty notes that the parties agreed to establish a claims commission for the mutual settlement of all financial claims although this commission was never set up in practice.

The rights of Jews displaced from Arab lands were discussed at "Camp David II" in July 2000. On July 28, 2000, U.S. President Bill Clinton was interviewed on Israeli television and stated clearly:

"There will have to be some sort of international fund set up for the refugees. There is, I think, some interest, interestingly enough, on both sides, in also having a fund which compensates the Israelis who were made refugees by the war, which occurred after the birth of the State of Israel. Israel is full of people, Jewish people, who lived in predominantly Arab countries who came to Israel because they were made refugees in their own land."

This candour by President Clinton has not been replicated by others in leadership positions. If one thought of Israel, the West Bank and Gaza as on the moon rather than in the Middle East, this blinkered approach, looking only at Palestinian refugees in isolation from displaced Jews, might have a certain logic to it. Redress due to displaced Jews is not due from the Palestinian leadership. Jewish refugees did not, for the most part, flee the West Bank and Gaza.

However, if one looks at the peace process in context, if one places Israel in the Middle East, where it obviously is, if one accepts that peace in the Middle East means peace with Israel's Arab neighbours as much as with the Palestinians, then it is impossible to overlook the issue of displaced Jews. A settlement of outstanding disputes between Israel and its neighbours must resolve this dispute.

A comprehensive peace must be endurable and enduring. There can be no peace without truth or justice. Recognition of the past is essential to the integrity of the Middle East peace process. Rejection of memory is a rejection of peace. Justice in the Middle East includes justice for Jews from Iran and Arab countries. Unless the displacement of Jews from Arab lands and Iran is acknowledged within the Middle East peace process, unless Jews displaced from Arab lands and Iran are treated equitably in the Middle East peace process, there will be no true, just peace.

The Injustice

Some 850,000 Jews were displaced from Arab countries after the creation of the State of Israel. About 600,000 of those settled in Israel. While somewhat different in context, there was victimization, and a right to redress also exists, for another 57,000 Jews displaced from Iran.

These people were not, for the most part, voluntary migrants seeking to leave their home countries for economic reasons or wanting to immigrate to Israel for religious or ethnic reasons. They were mainly refugees forced to flee to save themselves. Before they were displaced, they were threatened, harassed and persecuted. Before they were displaced, as part and parcel of the persecution they suffered, or after, their property was forfeited or confiscated. The Jews who were displaced from Arab countries and Iran are a victim population, people who suffered human rights violations at the hands of the governments and populations in the countries in which they lived.

The story of that victimization has been described many times. That victimization creates a right to redress.

Redress

In international law, any human rights violation gives rise to a right to redress. The right belongs both to the victim and the beneficiaries of the victim. The duty to make redress falls on the state responsible for the human rights violations.

Today, there are regimes, most notably in Iraq and Egypt that are not the regimes that were in place at the time the violations occurred. Even in those cases, it can be argued that successor regimes should provide reparation to the victims.

Reparations should be adequate, effective and prompt. They should be proportionate to the gravity of the violations and the harm suffered.

Reparations for the taking of property are also due to foreign nationals; that is, nationals of another country other than those of the regime that did the taking, whether victims of human rights violations or not. In this case, the state to which the foreign national belongs is entitled to assert the right of its national to reparations.

Arbitrary deprivation of property is itself a violation of a fundamental human right, forbidden by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. There does not have to be violation of another right accompanying the arbitrary deprivation in order for human rights to be violated.

Remedies

The High Commissioner and Mandate Refugees

The Statute of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees obligates the High Commissioner to provide for the protection of refugees falling under the competence of his office by, amongst other duties, "endeavouring to obtain permission for refugees to transfer their assets and especially those necessary for resettlement." This provision is noteworthy, not only because of the duty it imposes on the High Commissioner, but also because it covers all assets.

There need be no nexus between the human rights violations that had caused the flight and the assets left behind to trigger the duty owed by the High Commissioner. Indeed, the assets may remain under the ownership of the refugee. As long as there are any restrictions on the transfer of the assets out of the country fled, the Statute of the High Commissioner requires him to act. Although many of the Jews from Arab countries were displaced decades ago, many are still suffering financial and other resettlement difficulties that emanated from their displacement.

In order for a refugee population to fall within the mandate of the High Commissioner, the High Commissioner or some other instance has to determine that the population has or had a well-founded fear of persecution. The High Commissioner has made such a determination for Jews from Arab countries.

In the first instance of this determination, in his first statement as newly elected High Commissioner, Mr. Auguste Lindt, at the Jan. 29, 1957, meeting of the United Nations Refugee Fund Executive Committee (UNREF) in Geneva, stated:

"Another emergency problem is now arising: that of refugees from Egypt. There is no doubt in my mind that those refugees from Egypt who are not able, or not willing to avail themselves of the protection of the government of their nationality fall under the mandate of my office."

In the second such instance, Dr. E. Jahn for the Office of the High Commissioner wrote to Daniel Lack, Legal Adviser to the American Joint Distribution Committee, on July 6, 1967:

"I refer to our recent discussion concerning Jews from Middle Eastern and North African countries in consequence of recent events. I am now able to inform you that such persons may be considered prima facie within the mandate of this Office."

The High Commissioner has gone about endeavouring to obtain permission from Arab governments for Jewish refugees to transfer their assets from the Arab countries they fled. Mostly, those efforts did not succeed. However, the efforts themselves are noteworthy. They remind us that the High Commissioner is available, still, to pursue the transfer of assets. As well, the determination by the High Commissioner that these refugees fall within his mandate is a determination by an international instance that these refugees have or had a well-founded fear of persecution.

Persecution is any serious violation of human rights. Such persecution was clearly documented in the first section of this paper. The UNHCR made an independent determination, and confirmed publicly on at least two occasions, that Jews from Arab countries were victims of serious human rights violations that caused their flight. That determination remains valid and has contemporary legal consequences, beyond the previous efforts of the High Commissioner to obtain permission from persecuting governments to transfer refugee assets.

The High Commissioner and Convention Refugees

The Refugee Convention also has a restitution provision requiring contracting states to give sympathetic consideration to the transfer of assets of refugees. An obligation to give sympathetic consideration is more than mere words. While an obligation to give sympathetic consideration does allow a contracting state to say no to a request to transfer assets, all treaties must be performed in good faith. Sham consideration, unsympathetic consideration would be a violation of the treaty.

Treaties do not have retroactive force. However, the obligation to transfer assets is not a retroactive obligation. It is a contemporary obligation, as a matter of Treaty interpretation. As long as the assets still exist, and the request to transfer is current, we are dealing with present facts and not past facts.

It would frustrate the purpose of resettlement of the Refugee Convention to interpret the Convention not to apply to assets in a contracting state belonging to refugees who fled before the contracting state acceded to the Convention. Where transfer of assets is necessary for resettlement, then allowing transfer means that there will be resettlement. Refusing transfer means that there will not be true resettlement. An interpretation of the treaty that would facilitate resettlement has to be favoured over an interpretation that would frustrate resettlement.

An International Fund

The United Nations Compensation Commission and Fund provides a model for a remedy that could be negotiated as part of an Arab-Israeli comprehensive settlement. The United Nations Compensation Commission and Fund were established by Security Council resolution in May 1991, to compensate foreign nationals, companies and governments for injuries suffered as the result of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

This model could be used to arrange for compensation for Jewish refugees arising out of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Moneys could come from the governments of the countries from which the Jews were displaced. But the source of the funds could be broader. It need not be restricted to those governments.

The intended beneficiaries of the fund could also be broader, allowing all those displaced, both Jewish and Palestinian, to make claims against an international fund established specifically for that purpose whether or not the Jews are in Israel, whether or not the Palestinians are in refugee camps or in the West Bank and Gaza. Though the remedy here is patterned after the UN Compensation Fund, the remedy would not be a UN Fund, but rather a fund established as part of and the result of an Arab-Israeli comprehensive settlement.

> The likelihood of Jews obtaining justice in the courts of the countries from which they were displaced is small.

It may seem strange to arrange for settlement of all Jewish claims from Arab states in the context of an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement when many of those Jewish persons with claims are not Israeli citizens and when the claims are almost entirely not against Palestinians or their representatives. But one objective in the negotiations is to ensure that an Arab-Israeli settlement would constitute an end to all claims arising out of the conflict, including private claims. The private claims of Palestinian refugees would have to be limited to the avenues of relief expressly created in an Arab-Israeli settlement and extinguished otherwise.

It may unreasonable to expect that an Arab-Israeli settlement would limit within a fund established by the agreement and otherwise extinguish Palestinian claims but neither extinguish nor limit Jewish claims. Whatever differences may exist between Palestinian and Jewish claims, these may have to be addressed within an Arab-Israeli settlement and the mechanisms for compensation from the fund.

If it were otherwise, if Jewish claims were not satisfied within the Arab-Israeli settlement and extinguished outside that agreement, then Palestinians might also argue that their claims too are not extinguished by virtue of the settlement. A crucial dispute would remain unresolved.

Foreign Courts

The likelihood of Jews obtaining justice in the courts of the countries from which they were displaced is small. Indeed, part of the persecution they suffered was the perversion of justice, the absence of an effective remedy in their home countries. By way of example, the Camp David Framework for Peace in the Middle East of 1978 (the "Camp David Accords") includes, in paragraph A (1)(f), a commitment by Egypt and Israel to "work with each other and with other interested parties to establish agreed procedures for a prompt, just and permanent resolution of the implementation of the refugee problem." It could be argued that the unqualified reference to the "refugee problem" can be regarded as an indication that Egypt and Israel envisioned a broad resolution of the refugee problem that included both Palestinian and Jewish refugees.

Lifting the veil of silence

By KEITH LANDY and
JOSEPH GABAY

In 1947, there were nearly one million Jews living in Arab countries. Today there are less than 8,000.

Some Arab states, such as Libya, are completely judenrein. Others have the disparate remnants of once-vibrant communities. During their concerted effort to force the Jews to flee, the Arab states uprooted and destroyed more than 2,000 years of Jewish life and history in the region. This is a tragic legacy whose consequences are still felt in Diaspora communities throughout the world – and a political reality whose current relevance should no longer be ignored.

In Montreal on Nov. 17, 2002, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) took an important step in refocusing attention on this legacy. In collaboration with World Jewish Congress, CJC organized what was to become the second in a series of conferences around the globe on the "Forgotten Exodus" of the Jews from Arab lands. After years of international silence and sometimes disinterest, Congress, nationally and internationally, seized the important moment and brought the story back to light. There was a second Middle East refugee question to be examined, and the time was now. This effort, repeated in San Francisco and London, has awakened hope and rekindled determination that the tragic account of Jewish escape from Arab lands will be heard and the beginnings of a just resolution be put in motion.

Mothers and fathers who, out of fear and heartbreak, had never shared their traumatic experiences with their own children found the courage to share them with strangers and the media. Gabrielle, who didn't feel safe using her last name, shared her story with her daughters for the first time in preparation for the Montreal event. The abduction of her father, a leader in Lebanon's Jewish community, became the first of many such disappearances and spelled the end of Lebanon's Jewish community. In the presence of an audience of hundreds, she and two other witnesses opened their sealed vaults of memories and released a flood, revealing a forgotten heritage rich in its history and tragic in its conclusion. Their tragic stories could have been told by many of the hundreds of thousands of Jews who fled Arab lands. Their heritage was not intended to be forgotten.

As Israel continues to strive for peace, as the plight of the Palestinians continues to paint the front pages, there is another story that must be heard before a true peace can be reached. While some Jews from Arab lands lived as refugees for a short time, even several years, all of them today have integrated into their new adoptive countries. In Israel, former refugees from these countries have served as judges on the Supreme Court, members of Knesset, doctors, lawyers and active contributors to society. In other countries such as Canada, France and England, those former refugees have become proud and loyal citizens and have permeated all walks of life, contributing to the betterment and vitality of their new communities.

The leadership of Arab countries, unwilling to recognize the State of Israel, has intentionally and inhumanely refused to absorb the Arabs displaced in the War of Independence in 1948 in their own countries, thereby perpetuating the situation of the Palestinians. At a time when Israel was a fledgling state with almost no economic capacity for absorption, the Jewish refugees were integrated with open arms, providing them with shelter, medical attention and a new start.

> The Arab countries have cynically exploited the Palestinians as political pawns to be used in the war against Israel

Unlike their Israeli neighbours, the Arab countries, rich in oil, have cynically exploited the Palestinians as political pawns to be used in the war against Israel. There are 400,000 Palestinians in Lebanon who are not allowed to send their children to schools only a few blocks away, because they are left in camps and treated as refugees. Three generations later, Palestinians living in countries around the world continue to claim refugee status and a desire to "return" to towns to which many of them have never been. The history of the 20th century is full of instances of population transfers and resolved refugee crises. The more than 60 million refugees resulting from World War II were no longer refugees in their own generation.

While the world focuses on the story of the Palestinians, few know or hear about the plight of the Jewish refugees. In the 1940s, years after the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, more than 1,000 Jews were killed in anti-Jewish rioting and pogroms in Iraq, Libya, Egypt, Syria, and Yemen. This helped trigger the mass exodus of Jews from Arab countries.

In the 1950s, 104,000 Jews were rescued from Iraq in Operation Ezra and Nechemia. In Egypt, the message was just as clear: it would be better for Jews to abandon their property and to leave as soon as possible. Between November 1956 and June 1957, more than 22,200 Jews left Egypt, and more than 13,500 Egyptian Jews arrived in Israel by October 1957. Persecution of the Jews continued in Egypt, and today, only 200 out of a community of 75,000 are left. Similar scenarios played out in Lebanon, Libya, Yemen and Syria, where ransoms were often paid to secure releases.

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler reminded participants at the Montreal conference that while there were periods of relative peace for Jews in Arab lands, "the protected status of Jews under Islam must be de-mythologized. Jews were not equal. They were second-class citizens, at best. The fact that Sephardi Jews were treated better than many of their European counterparts in no way refutes or makes up for state-sanctioned persecution. It does not exculpate them. We should never be allowed to forget that we were treated as inferior human beings under them, and that we must see reconciliation and reparation as a precondition for peace."

As we begin a new year, let us not forget the plight of those who fled from persecution in Arab lands. Let us remember their proud history and heritage.

Canada is committed to dealing with refugee issues in the context of an Israeli-Palestinian peace process. CJC is planning another conference on the subject in Toronto this autumn. It is also calling on the Canadian government to focus attention – particularly in the final stages of negotiations – on our brothers and sisters who were stripped of their property and expelled from Arab countries in which they had lived for generations. We must now remove the veil of silence that surrounds the story of the Jewish refugees. We ask Canada to make the case on this compelling human rights issue, in the search for justice, peace and reconciliation.

Keith Landy is the national president of Canadian Jewish Congress and Joseph Gabay is the chair of its Quebec region.

Moreover, Article 8 of the Treaty provides that the "parties agree to establish a claims commission for the mutual settlement of all financial claims." In practice, this commission has not been established and no lawsuits filed by former Jewish refugees from Egypt in Egyptian courts have ever been satisfactorily resolved.

This failure raises the question of the availability of foreign justice. The use of foreign courts raises two questions. One is whether the law of the foreign state allows a remedy. The other is whether international law allows a remedy.

There have been a number of developments in the international arena in recent years to suggest that the principle that a state may allow a litigant to seek reparations against a foreign state for violations of fundamental human rights has reached the status of customary international law. Customary international law is the practice of states that they view as legally binding upon them. Developments include the Statute of the International Criminal Court, the writings of the International Law Commission, the reasoning of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and legal opinions of states expressed in the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and General Assembly.

Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC) is a coalition of major Jewish organizations dedicated to securing rights and redress for former Jewish refugees. Founded in the United States, JJAC now operates under the auspices of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, the American Sephardi Federation and the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries with the active participation of the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress and the Anti-Defamation League.

Honorary Chairs are Irwin Cotler (Canada), Shlomo Hillel (Israel), Richard Holbrooke (U.S.), Leon Levy (U.S.), Lord Weidenfeld (U.K.). Founder is S. Daniel Abraham.

How to resolve Jewish Arab refugee claims stirs debate

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The question of how to proceed with the claims of Jews from Arab countries has lingered, unresolved, for many years, with an ongoing debate on how to solve the problem.

Raffaello Fellah, co-chair of the World Association of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC), believes the claims of Jews from Arab countries must be linked to those made by Palestinian refugees and that both issues must be dealt with in the context of the Middle East peace process.

Founded in 1975, WOJAC was created intially to relieve the distress of Jews forced to leave Arab countries after the creation of the State of Israel, abandoning all they owned. It later began raising awareness of the issue through various educational projects and lobby efforts.

"Jewish organizations need to act jointly and launch a claim similar to the one brought against Germany by Holocaust victims," Fellah said in a phone interview from Rome.

"There are differences between the two cases," Fellah acknowledged. Germany wanted to repair the damages, Arab countries do not.

However, a lot can be gained by simply forcing both sides of the dispute – Jewish refugees and representatives of Arab governments – to meet at the negotiating table, he said.

WOJAC places the number of Arabs that left Palestinian territory at 590,000 and the Jews that left Arab countries at around one million. The number of Jews from Arab countries and the number of Palestinians each total approximately four million.

As for assets, Fellah said that a 1978 conference in Washington, D.C., estimated the value of property left behind by Jewish refugees at billions of dollars.

The WOJAC Web site says the immediate cause of the en masse exodus of the Jews from Arab states "was the considerable deterioration of their situation, … a process which occurred mainly between 1948 and the 1960s, as a result of a wave of Arab nationalism and the establishment of sovereign Arab states in the 20th century."

The Web site goes on to say that any Middle East peace accord must deal with all victims – Palestinian and Jewish – fairly and equitably within the framework of negotiations.

The new democratization of Iraq could mark a turning point, Fellah said.

Attention should also be paid to a boycott law, created in 1957 in Damascus by the Arab League, that allowed governments to confiscate all properties abandoned by Jews in Arab countries, Fellah said.

Issues need to be addressed first through diplomatic and political means, and then, if necessary, in front of the courts, he said.

"The most important thing is not to make individual cases," Fellah said. "We must be united on this subject. No organization should be the prima donna."

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, an international human rights lawyer and activist, says Justice for Jews from Arab Countries, an organization formed this past June, has spent the past few months collecting testimonies and preparing a composite legal study to facilitate those who wish to pursue lawsuits.

In a phone interview, Cotler said that "refugees have become the looking glass by which contemporary conflicts are understood.

"For this reason, it's important to return the question of Jewish refugees to the narrative. Otherwise, it's Middle East revisionism," Cotler said.

"Jews from Arab countries were the victims of patterns of harrassment and discrimination: assets were seized and legislation was passed declaring the Jewish nation an enemy of the people," Cotler said.

"The forgotten exodus of these Jews deserves to be recorded and presented," he added.

This doesn't take away from the importance of Palestinian refugees, Cotler said. But the United Nations General Assembly has passed 101 resolutions on refugees from different countries, many of them dealing with Palestinians, and "not a single one deals with Jewish refugees," he said.

"If the United Nations wants to be a fair-minded arbiter, it should consider both… it needs to acknowledge that there is a joint victimization."

However, Yehouda Shenhav, a professor at Tel Aviv University and editor of Theory Criticism, an Israeli journal of critical theory and cultural studies, says it is unfair to both the Palestinians and Mizrahi Jews – Middle Eastern Jews – to compare the two groups.

In a recent article in Ha'aretz, Shenhav wrote that "the history of the Mizrahi aliyah [immigration to Israel] is complex, and cannot be subsumed within a facile explanation. Many of the newcomers lost considerable property, and there can be no question that they should be allowed to submit individual property claims against Arab states (up to the present day, the State of Israel and WOJAC have blocked the submission of [individual] claims on this basis)."

In addition, Shenhav wrote, WOJAC, "which intended to promote Zionist claims and assist Israel in its conflict with Palestinian nationalism, accomplished the opposite: it presented a confused Zionist position regarding the dispute with the Palestinians, and infuriated many Mizrahi Jews around the world by casting them as victims bereft of positive motivation to immigrate to Israel."

Shenhav quoted former Israeli government ministers Yisrael Yeshayahu, who was born in Yemen (he died in 1979), and Shlomo Hillel, who is from Iraq, as saying they weren't refugees. They came with messianic and Zionist aspirations.

But Cotler said the two terms, refugees and Zionists, shouldn't be considered mutually exclusive. Jews from Arab countries may have been Zionists, but their immigration to Israel increased because of discrimination.

Linda lost 51 pounds in 8 short months

"Hi, I'm Linda Blackwood. When I quit smoking at age 40, I packed on pounds so quickly, it made my head spin.

I discovered Positive Changes Hypnosis in the newspaper. I read and re-read the ads, but put off calling. I was skeptical. Finally, I scheduled my free weight loss consultation.

I melted off 6 pounds my first week and 12 pounds my first month. My husband couldn't believe it. These were major changes for me, but I wasn't conscious of putting any effort into it. Best of all, hypnosis eliminated those horrible cravings.

To be honest, I am still puzzled by how hypnosis works. I only know that my life has improved in amazing ways.

You can do it too! Call now." — Linda Blackwood

Ariel Sharon wins Israeli election

Tishrei

EVENTS

- Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was prevented from speaking at Concordia University in Montreal by violent pro-Palestinian demonstrations. Subsequently, the school's administration imposed a three-month moratorium on all Mideast-related events.

- Due to fear that part of the Western Wall would collapse, Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert called on the government to stop the Waqf, the Muslim religious trust, from building around the Temple Mount. Jordanian engineers later repaired a section of the wall that had been damaged by poor water drainage.

- In a case involving Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA), the Federal Court of Appeal rejected Canada's policy of disallowing tax deductible donations to charitable groups that operate outside Israel's pre-1967 borders. Canada Customs and Revenue Agency and CMDA later struck a deal allowing CMDA to retain its charitable status.

PEOPLE

- Mel Cappe became Canada's high commissioner to the United Kingdom, the first Jew so named.

Cheshvan

EVENTS

- Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt issued the country's first apology for its complicity in deporting thousands of Jews to Nazi death camps during World War II.

- Ignoring threats and entreaties from Israel, Lebanon inaugurated a pumping station to divert water from a Jordan River tributary.

- Three of eight Iranian Jews charged with "espionage for the Zionist regime" were freed from an Iranian prison.

- Representatives of German insurance companies and the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims signed a landmark agreement to trigger the release of $100 million (US) to pay claims against German companies and $175 million to be used for humanitarian purposes.

PEOPLE

- Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa conferred a blessing on Queen Elizabeth II in a multi-faith service during her jubilee visit to the nation's capital.

- Imre Kertesz, a Hungarian Jew who survived Auschwitz, won the Nobel Prize in literature.

Kislev

EVENTS

- Twelve Concordia University students were charged for their roles in the violent protests that prevented Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking Sept. 9.

- Despite international pressure to have it cancelled, Egypt aired a TV series, Horseman without a Horse, that is based on The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, an anti-Semitic forgery that accuses Jews of plotting world domination.

- The B.C. Supreme Court began an extradition hearing for former Nazi SS member Michael Seifert. Ottawa had already begun the process of stripping him of his citizenship and extraditing him to Italy, where he was convicted in absentia of rape, torture and murder. He was later ordered deported.

- Haifa mayor Amram Mitzna was elected leader of Israel's Labor Party. He resigned six months later, after Labor's worst-ever electoral showing, blaming party members for infighting and backstabbing.

- The Simon Wiesenthal Centre announced plans for a new $150 million (US) tolerance centre in Jerusalem.

- Terrorists bombed the Israeli-owned Paradise Hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, killing three Israelis and 10 Kenyans. Meanwhile, two surface-to-air missiles were fired at an Israeli charter plane leaving Mombasa's airport. None of its 261 passengers were hurt and the plane landed safely in Israel.

- Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon retained the leadership of the Likud party, defeating former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu by 15 per cent in party primaries.

Likud Party supporters celebrate

- Terrorists opened fire at a Likud leadership primary, killing six and wounding 43. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades claimed responsibility.

PEOPLE

- Abba Eban, the former Israeli foreign minister and a onetime ambassador to the UN and the United States, died at 87.

- Barry Sherman, CEO of pharmaceutical giant Apotex Inc., and his wife Honey, donated $50 million to the UJA Federation of Toronto's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. It's the largest donation the organization has ever received.

Tevet

EVENTS

- The Concordia Student Union (CSU) suspended Hillel's funding and its right to hold events on campus after Hillel distributed flyers about a program that recruits Jews from abroad to serve in the Israeli army. Later, 100 Hillel students walked out of a CSU meeting when they were asked to sign an agreement that they will stop recruiting for any military or paramilitary organization. Subsequently, Hillel sued the CSU for $100,000 for violating its constitutional rights.

- The federal government added both the social and political wings of the Lebanon-based Hezbollah to its list of terrorist groups. The decision made it illegal for anyone in Canada to work with or contribute money to Hezbollah and allows authorities to seize any assets linked to the organization. The European Union also later added Hamas' non-military wing to its list of banned terror groups.

- Former Assembly of First Nations leader David Ahenakew was quoted in the Saskatoon StarPhoenix as saying Hitler "fried" six million Jews because they "would have owned the god-damned world." He publicly apologized and resigned from his position as senate chairman of the Federation of Saskatchewan First Nations. He was later charged with promoting hatred and the Governor General's office considered stripping him of his Order of Canada.

PEOPLE

- Jerusalem Post columnist and former Montrealer Sam Orbaum died of cancer at 46.

Shvat

EVENTS

- Twenty-three people died in double suicide attacks in Tel Aviv. Islamic Jihad, Hamas and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades took responsibility. Subsequently, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, whose Fatah movement has been linked to the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, was prevented by Israel from attending a peace conference in London.

- Researchers from the Technion and Rambam Hospital in Haifa succeeded in creating heart tissue from fetal stem cells. They said the tissue could be used to check how certain medicines affect the heart.

- The Jewish Youth Library in Ottawa was set on fire. Police estimated the damage at $10,000.

- Controversial pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes spoke at York University in Toronto after campus groups tried to stop him from speaking.

PEOPLE

- Canadians marked the first annual Raoul Wallenberg Day. The Swedish diplomat is credited with rescuing more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis.

Adar I

EVENTS

- The space shuttle Columbia disintegrated upon re-entering the Earth's atmosphere, killing all seven crew members. Aboard was Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut.

- Belgium's Supreme Court ruled Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon can't be tried on charges brought by Palestinians for alleged war crimes in connection with the Sabra and Shatila massacres in the early 1980s as long as he is Israel's prime minister and enjoys diplomatic immunity. But it left open the possibility of a trial once he steps down under a Belgian "universal jurisdiction" law that lets the country's courts try war crimes committed outside Belgium. Belgian legislators later revised the law to make such prosecutions more difficult.

- Nazi sympathizer and Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel was deported from the United States to Canada after he overstayed his U.S. visa. The government began proceedings to deport him to his native Germany.

- Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Yisrael B'Aliyah leader Natan Sharansky signed a deal to merge their parties. As a result, Sharon's Likud party won 40 seats.

- Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of the left-wing Tikkun Magazine, was barred from speaking at a San Francisco rally against war in Iraq that was organized by members of the anti-war group ANSWER because they would not allow a pro-Israel speaker to participate.

- The last five Jews imprisoned in Iran on charges of spying for Israel were released from jail.

- The Canadian government outlawed three more terror groups: the pro-Palestinian Abu Nidal group, the Al Qaeda-linked Abu Sayyaf group in the Philippines and the Peruvian group Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path).

- The Vatican opened secret archives from World War II that reportedly contained evidence of Pope Pius XI's complicity in the Nazi's persecution of the Jews. Documents also showed members of the clergy urged him to stop Hitler.

- At least 14 Palestinians were killed in clashes in the West Bank and in a six-hour Israeli military incursion into an area of Gaza City considered a Hamas hotbed. The incursion was in response to ongoing Gaza-based rocket attacks on the Negev town of Sderot and a Feb 15 attack on a tank in Gaza that killed four soldiers.

PEOPLE

- Some 1,400 people attended the funeral of 15-year-old Daniel Arato, one of seven Calgary teens killed by a massive avalanche in the Rogers Pass in British Columbia.

- Uri Lupoliansky became the first Haredi mayor of Jerusalem after Ehud Olmert resigned. He was later elected to the post.

- Isser Harel, the Israeli spy responsible for capturing Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, died at 91.

Adar II

EVENTS

- London-based Muslim cleric Sheik Abdullah Faisal, accused of supporting Osama bin Laden, was found guilty of urging followers to kill Jews, Hindus and Americans.

- Argentina issued arrest warrants for four Iranians, including two former ministers, suspected of planning the 1994 AMIA bombing that killed 85 people and wounded more than a hundred.

- French police arrested Nizar Ben Mohammed Nawar in connection with an explosion at the Ghriba Synagogue in Djerba, Tunisia, April 2002 that killed 19 people.

- A pro-Palestinian student activist at Concordia University was arrested for uttering death threats to three Jewish students and one visitor at a Hillel information booth.

- The U.S. began its invasion of Iraq.

- Jewish students at Carleton University were denied the right to protest an anti-Israel display by a Palestinian group on campus.

- The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades was added to Ottawa's list of terrorist organizations, bringing the number of banned terror groups to 26.

- Two movies with Jewish themes won Academy Awards: The Pianist for best actor, director and screenplay; and Nowhere in Africa for best foreign film.

- In an interview with Ha'aretz, Ariel Sharon said the creation of a Palestinian state is inevitable.

- The Jewish Agency and the Mossad sought to bring Iraq's remaining 34 Jews to Israel, but many of the Jews didn't want to leave.

- Israel Asper pledged $200 million for a human rights museum in Winnipeg. It will be the largest such museum in the world.

- U.S. President George W. Bush unveiled the new road map for Mideast peace, co-sponsored by the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

- A British Muslim of Pakistani origin carried out a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, killing three people. He was the first non-Palestinian to attack Israelis in the three years of renewed wide-scale violence.

- A spate of suicide attacks in Morocco were aimed at Jewish targets, but no Jews were among the 29 people killed.

PEOPLE

- Salim Joubran became the first Arab to be permanently appointed to Israel's Supreme Court.

- A man who withheld a get from his wife for 15 years was ordered by a Quebec judge to pay $47,500 in damages. The religious divorce was granted in 1995.

- Toronto-born Israeli soldier Daniel Mandel, 24, died in a raid on a building in Nablus where three Palestinian terrorists were suspected of hiding.

- American Cpl. Mark Evnin became the first Jewish soldier to die in the U.S-led invasion of Iraq.

Iyar

EVENTS

- A report from Tel Aviv University said there were more anti-Semitic acts worldwide in the last year than in the past decade. Some 311 incidents were reported, with France, Belgium and the Netherlands having the most.

- Israel's population grew 2.2 per cent since last year to 6.7 million.

- The 2001 Canadian census showed the number of people who listed Judaism as their religion is up by 3.7 per cent since 1991, to about 330,000. Meanwhile, the Jewish population in Quebec dropped eight per cent, to about 90,000. The census also found about 349,000 people listed Jewish as one of four possible ethnic origins. A UIA Federations Canada study later blended the figures and found 370,000 Jews in Canada.

Sivan

EVENTS

- U.S. President George W. Bush met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas at a summit in Aqaba, Jordan, to kick off the road map peace plan.

- Toronto's second outbreak of severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) touched the Jewish community after a patient died and several staff at a funeral home were in voluntary quarantine. Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care was touched by Toronto's second SARS outbreak when a man was transferred to its hospital for rehabilitation. At least two Jews also died in the city's first SARS outbreak.

- New Argentine President Nestor Kirchner said he will release secret evidence about the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires. Jewish leaders called it the most significant news in the case in nine years.

- A limestone ossuary that was supposed to have carried the bones of Jesus' brother James was declared a fake by the Israel Antiquities Authority, which said the box's inscription was a forgery. The owner of the ossuary, which had been damaged earlier in the year in transit to Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum, disputed the findings. He said he bought the box in the mid-1970s, but police and antiquities inspectors started separate investigations into whether it was recently stolen.

- The Federal Court of Appeal ruled the missionary group Chosen People Ministries can't use a stylized menorah as its official mark.

- The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe hosted a conference on anti-Semitism, the first time the group's annual meeting was dedicated to the subject.

- Israel cut off ties with the British Broadcasting Company, citing anti-Israel bias in the network's coverage.

PEOPLE

- Rabbi Israel Silverman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, died. He was 74.

Tammuz

EVENTS

- Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah announced a ceasefire with Israel. The next day, a Bulgarian construction worker was killed near Jenin by the Fatah-linked Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades.

- U.S. National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice asked Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to reconsider the route of the security fence it is building to separate Israel and the West Bank.

- 12 Liberal MPs and senators formally asked the Canadian government to move its Mideast policy in a more pro-Israel direction.

- Tel Aviv's "White City" Bauhaus architecture and Prague's Jewish Quarter were designated UNESCO world heritage sites.

- Anti-Semitic remarks in a recently unearthed diary of former U.S. president Harry Truman sparked debate about the man who lent Israel key diplomatic recognition shortly after its founding in 1948.

- In separate trips, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon visited Washington, D.C.

- Hundreds of North American immigrants arrived in Israel through funding from the U.S.-based Nefesh B'Nefesh organization.

PEOPLE

- Vancouver Jewish community leader and philanthropist Leon Kahn died of a heart attack at 78.

- Exodus author Leon Uris died in New York at age 78.

Av

EVENTS

- The Temple Mount was opened to visits by Jews and Christians for the first time since the upsurge in Palestinian violence began in September 2000 after a visit by Ariel Sharon, then Likud leader, to the site.

- The Knesset passed a controversial law preventing Palestinians who marry Israelis from receiving automatic citizenship.

- Two men were convicted of manslaughter in the death of Matti Baranovski. Israeli Daniel Weiz was acquitted.

- Hezbollah anti-aircraft shells killed a 16-year-old Israeli boy. Israel retaliated by flying into Lebanon and destroying Hezbollah positions.

- A suicide bombing on a Jerusalem bus killed 22 people. Hamas and Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility, effectively shattering the short-lived ceasefire among Palestinian extremist groups. Israel retaliated by killing Hamas leader Ismail Abu Shanab.

- Britain arrested an Iranian diplomat accused of involvement in the 1994 bombing of Argentina's AMIA Jewish community centre.

The Year 5763 in Review

PEOPLE

- Morris Fish became the first Jew to be named to the Supreme Court of Canada since Bora Laskin was appointed in 1970.

Elul

EVENTS

- The Christian missionary group Jews for Jesus launched a major campaign to attract converts on the streets of Toronto as part of a $22 million (US) drive to target Diaspora communities with 25,000 or more Jews. The counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism mounted a counter-campaign.

- The Israeli Justice Ministry launched a new probe into police behaviour in the killing of 12 Israeli Arabs and a Palestinian in October 2000 riots. The move came after the Orr Commission released a report that criticized police preparedness and relations with Israel's Arab minority. It also criticized then prime minister Ehud Barak for not being sufficiently aware of the potentially explosive situation among Israeli Arabs.

- Convicted spy Jonathan Pollard appeared in a U.S. court for a hearing requested by his lawyers to reduce his sentence and set him free. The former U.S. Navy analyst was convicted in 1987 of passing secret documents to Israel and sentenced to life in jail. His lawyers argued that Pollard received ineffective counsel from his original lawyer at his trial, when he pleaded guilty, and from another lawyer in his first appeal in the early 1990s.

- Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas resigned in a power struggle with PA President Yasser Arafat, who later appointed his ally, Ahmed Qureia, the speaker of the Palestinian parliament and the Number 3 man in his Fatah faction, to the post.

- Prime Minister Ariel Sharon made an offical visit to India, the first by an Israeli prime minister since Israel and India established full ties 11 years ago.

- Israel's security cabinet voted to "remove" Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat from the West Bank. The move came two days after 15 people were killed in two suicide attacks in Israel, one near the Tzrifin military base outside Rishon Lezion and one at a Jerusalem cafe.

The Year in Review was prepared by our summer interns, Elysse Zarek and Lauren Krugel, who are continuing their journalism studies at Ryerson and Carleton universities, respectively.

War shattered peace of Yom Kippur 30 years ago

There was a moment during the Yom Kippur War when supporters of Israel feared for the very existence of the Jewish state. Rallies and vigils were held around the world on behalf of Israel. The archival photo at the right depicts one of those vigils in Toronto.

Below, then prime minister Golda Meir visits one of the thousands of soldiers who were wounded in the war. Meir and her government were criticized for the country's apparent lack of military preparedness to meet the attacks launched by Egypt and Syria on Yom Kippur 30 years ago on Oct. 6.

Canada's passport policy on Jerusalem questioned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The policy of the government of Canada is that Jerusalem must stand alone as a notation for place of birth in Canadian passports, the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) says.

"Where an applicant was born in Jerusalem, the place of birth is to be shown as 'Jerusalem.' This policy was established as the status of Jerusalem has not been definitely determined," said DFAIT spokesperson Reynald Doiron.

"Due to the present political situation, Jerusalem must stand alone. It cannot be entered in conjunction with Israel or any other country name."

Doiron's reiteration of long-standing Canadian policy comes in the wake of a complaint by a Montreal woman who in recent letters to the editor to The CJN and other media outlets complained that her grand pdaughter's place of birth did not include the country, "Israel."

Ellen Tannenbaum wrote that her daughter, who resides in Israel, applied during the summer for a Canadian passport on behalf of her baby daughter. She was told the baby's place of birth in her passport would simply read, "Jerusalem," with no reference to Israel.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Accounts Frozen

OTTAWA — The federal government has ordered banks to report by Oct. 15 on whether they have found accounts connected to five Hamas-linked charities accused of providing funding to the outlawed group: the British-based Palestinian Relief and Development Fund, Interpal; the Al-Aqsa Foundation; the Comité de Bienfaisance et de Secours aux Palestiniens; the Association de Secours Palestinien; and the Sanabil Association for Relief and Development. Canada declared Hamas a terrorist group last fall and has ordered the accounts frozen.

ISRAEL

Simcha Dinitz Dies

JERUSALEM — Simcha Dinitz, Israel's former ambassador to the United States and chair of the Jewish Agency, died last week of a heart attack in Jerusalem. He was 74. He joined the Haganah in pre-state Palestine and served in the War of Independence. He spent 37 years in a variety of public posts, including the Knesset, the Foreign Ministry and the Jewish Agency, which he headed from 1987 to 1994.

Space Deal with India

JERUSALEM — Israel will send a $15 million (US) telescope into space on an Indian rocket in 2005 for scientific purposes, Israeli officials told the Indian Express newspaper. The news follows Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent trip to India, during which India and Israel signed six deals to broaden educational, medical, cultural and technology ties, as well as an environmental protection pact. The countries have been co-operating on space-related issues for 2½ years.

Open as Usual?

TEL AVIV — Beth Hatefutsoth, the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, says it is open as usual despite its ongoing financial difficulties. The announcement came after the Tel Aviv Labour Court ordered it to reinstate 65 employees given three months unpaid leave due to the museum's fiscal crisis, saying the unilateral action violated its labour contract. The museum had announced a temporary three-month closure.

WORLD

Suspects Arrested

CASABLANCA — Moroccan police have arrested two men suspected of murdering a Jewish man in Casablanca on Sept. 11. They are believed to be members of the Islamist movement Salafia Jihadia, which is suspected of being behind May bombings in Casablanca that killed more than 40 people, the Moroccan news agency MAP said. The report also said police believe robbery was the motive behind the fatal stabbing in Meknes of a second Jewish man Sept. 13.

Manischewitz Dies

NEW YORK — Kosher food giant Bernard Manischewitz died Sept. 20 in New Jersey at 89. He was the last of his family to run the kosher food firm B. Manischewitz Company before its sale to private investors in 1991. The company, which had been in the family for three generations, was founded in 1888 by Bernard's grandfather, Rabbi Dov Behr Manischewitz.

Agunah Get Day

NEW YORK — The U.S.-based advocacy group L'Maan B'Nos Yisrael International, with the support of the major North American Orthodox groups, is calling on recalcitrant husbands to do tshuvah and give their wives gets before Yom Kippur. The group has designated Oct. 2 as "Agunah Get Day," and it says batei din will be ready in locations worldwide to help and that it will pay the costs for sofers. For details, visit www.lbyi.org.

ADL Fetes Berlusconi

NEW YORK — Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi received the Anti-Defamation League's Distinguished Statesman Award less than two weeks after he defended fascist dictator Benito Mussolini as someone who "never killed anyone." ADL national director Abraham Foxman, who earlier called Berlusconi a "flawed friend," praised Italy for showing Israel more understanding and support than any other country in Europe.

Zundel Detention Case Drags On

The detention review of Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel continued last week, with him testifying he gave $10,000 to cover court costs of a German racist convicted of insulting the memory of the dead and insulting the state of Germany.

He told the Federal Court hearing that he helped Holocaust-denier Ewald Althans because he "did things for me," including sell Zundel's books and videos.

Zundel, 64, is being detained pending a review of a federal claim that he is a security risk. He faces deportation to his native Germany, where he could face charges for inciting hatred. Government lawyers contend he might be a flight risk if released and might resume links to white supremacists.

Zundel has been in detention since February after the United States deported him for immigration violations. The hearing has continued sporadically since May.

Also last week, the National Post reported that Toronto lawyer Peter Lindsay may be taking over Zundel's defence. Victoria lawyer Doug Christie told Judge Pierre Blais he may no longer be able to continue as Zundel's counsel because his wife has been diagnosed with cancer. Blais earlier rejected Christie's motion that the judge remove himself from the case due to bias against Zundel.

The court also heard testimony last week from Dr. Lorraine Day, a U.S doctor who practises alternative cancer treatments, that Zundel has a tumour in his chest and was at risk if he continued to be held in detention.

Christian missionary likely a pawn in Syrian game

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For 50 days in the heat of the summer, Bruce Balfour experienced what it's like to run afoul of the government of Syria.

Beginning in mid-July, he was incarcerated inside "colossally overcrowded" Lebanese prisons, "roughed up a bit," forced to sweat it out in a parked car in the Lebanese sun for hours on end, and in constant fear of being transferred to Syria, where he expected he would have disappeared without a trace.

All this on the trumped-up charge of collaborating with Israel.

Balfour believes his fate could have been much worse had the media not gotten hold of his story and Canadian authorities worked out a deal to gain his release early September.

Compared to his fellow prisoners in Lebanese prisons, some of whom have been languishing for years on minor charges, Balfour had it easy and was freed relatively quickly.

A Christian missionary who has lived in Israel at times, Balfour had only kind words for the efforts of Lebanon-based Canadian diplomats. He still speaks with a mixture of pride and awe of the arrival of Citizenship and Immigration Minister Denis Coderre at the Rouhmi prison in a limousine belonging to Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

That was a sight never before seen before in Lebanon, Balfour said.

Bruce Balfour

Soon after the visit, despite having to undergo two more sham trials, he was released. Though originally facing up to 15 years in jail, he was acquitted of the collaboration charge and convicted instead of inciting sectarian sentiments. A Lebanese tribunal ruled the seven weeks he had spent in detention was sufficient and ordered him deported.

Balfour, who had travelled to Lebanon to work on a plan to plant cedar trees as described in the Bible, suspects Canada had to pay some kind of price, provide some kind of quid pro quo, to effect his release.

That sort of deal-making is standard operating procedure in the Middle East, said Elias Youssef Bejjani, spokesman for the Canadian Lebanese Human Rights Foundation.

Lebanon is thoroughly under the control of the occupying Syrian army, with Lebanese ministries responsible to their Syrian counterparts, he said. Hariri, a multi-millionaire businessman with ties with Canadian authorities, likely never even knew of Balfour's arrest.

Speculating on the reasons for Balfour's detention, Bejjani said "the plan was to hold Balfour, forge the case and give it to Syrians and Iran to negotiate with."

In effect, he said, Balfour would be little more than a pawn in international wheeling and dealing related to other issues, perhaps the Zahra Kazemi case in Iran. Kazemi, a photojournalist with dual Canadian/Iranian citizenship, was killed while in Iranian custody.

Balfour said the charges he originally faced were completely fraudulent. For months prior to his incarceration, he had been negotiating with Lebanese officials to fulfill his

Ambassador's holiday thoughts

From the editor's desk

A week and a day before Rosh Hashanah, I met with Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada. The ambassador was in a contemplative mood, although clearly agitated by the latest negative portrayal of Israel in the news, and wanted to share some pre-holiday thoughts with the readers of The CJN.

For a number of days, the media, like rapacious sharks, had been feeding on Israel for having suggested it might expel Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat from Ramallah. Many governments around the world seemed as agitated as the media. Criticism of Israel was unceasing. The most notorious of the international anti-Israel reflexes was now also twitching: the United Nations was mobilizing to enshrine its displeasure with Israel into an official document to add to the existing mountain-high pile of documents of official, UN anti-Israel obloquy.

"We are at a crossroads," the ambassador said, looking directly into my eyes. "A war of attrition has been inflicted upon us whose aim is to weaken us economically, physically and spiritually.

"But we will win this war. We have no alternative. We will win this war through endurance, perseverance and unity."

As the subject of Arafat was on the front page of most newspapers that day, it was not far from the ambassador's mind.

"We feel a great deal of frustration with the reaction of the international community [concerning Israel's decision to expel Arafat]. Everyone agrees that Arafat is an obstacle to peace. Even the Palestinians know he is an obstacle to peace. Many Arabs speak in harsh terms about him behind the scenes.

"Everyone knows about his destructive role [in sabotaging the peace process]. We have hard-core facts that prove it."

The ambassador's voice trailed off as he looked out the window at the clouds rolling through the western sky.

"We warned everyone about the hudna [ceasefire], that they would abuse it and take advantage of it.

"Do Canadians know, for example, that during the hudna, Hamas continued to launch Qassem missiles against Israel? Ashkelon was hit by missiles that were aimed at the power station there. Thank God the missiles missed the station, which by the way, provides one quarter of the country's electricity. No one was hurt.

"Is the road map just an empty phrase? Or is it to be something real?

"We are committed to the road map. We are committed to peace. That is why we say: Let's give the new Palestinian prime minister [Ahmed Queria] a chance. I am hopeful, though not optimistic. For peace to come there has to be a radical change within Palestinian society."

His personal frustration fully evident, Divon then added: "There must also be radical change within the international community which must decide to no longer tolerate terror against Israel, just as it is has decided to no longer tolerate terrorism in Afghanistan."

"Two months ago I sat with my daughter at the Cafe Hillel [in Jerusalem]. Two weeks ago another father and his daughter sat there too. But they did not return home.

"It is hard for Canadians to fathom a bus or a café full of people blowing up in front of their eyes. And I don't want Canadians to ever have to go through these experiences, but they must try to understand that Israel has a right to defend its citizens.

"We do not target civilians. But mistakes unfortunately do happen." To underscore the point, Divon repeated the statement. "We do not target civilians."

Then the ambassador's tone changed. Frustration gave way to resolve.

"These are very difficult times, yes, but we will face them as we must and as we always have. For more than 3,000 years, we have spoken the same language, worshipped the same God, kept the same traditions and always yearned for Jerusalem. As long as we remember who we are, who we represent and the responsibility we carry upon our shoulders, it is inconceivable that our spirits will break down."

Almost an hour had passed at this point, and it was time for the ambassador to take his leave. "Even though it sounds like a cliché, the love and affection of the Jewish community here towards Israel is very important to us.

"One of the most important things our Diaspora brethren can do for us is to visit. It strengthens us and it also strengthens the visitors who get a first hand sense of the accomplishments of our tiny country.

"Wars of attrition are usually long struggles. That is why we must display the stamina of a marathon runner.

"Eventually, a new PA leadership will emerge. And it is my firm belief that in the end, we will have peace."

"Shanah tovah to you and to all The CJN readers," the ambassador said to me as we shook hands.

"And to you," I answered, "and to all the people of Israel."

This issue of the paper appears the same day as the Ontario election. We are disappointed that of the three leaders of the major parties, only Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty failed to respond to our request for an interview.

UN official briefed on anti-Semitism in Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The United Nations' top human rights watchdog was apprised of anti-Semitism in Canada in a series of recent meetings with domestic Jewish groups.

B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress and Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre joined forces late last month to brief the UN's Special Rapporteur on Racism, Doudou Diène, on what the groups called a rising and alarming tide of anti-Semitism in Canada.

Diène, whose full title is Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance of the UN Commission on Human Rights, was in Canada for 10 days of meetings with government officials, Aboriginal groups and leaders of ethno-cultural and religious organizations.

He will report his findings on racism, discrimination and anti-Semitism in Canada to the UN's Commission on Human Rights next March.

Its the same UN committee that in 1999 found Canada, specifically Ontario, had violated international covenants by funding Catholic and not other faith-based education, especially Jewish day schools. Following Ontario's refusal to fund all religious schools, Canadian officials were called in for chastisement by the UN's human rights rapporteur.

In three separate meetings with Diène, Canadian Jewish Congress expressed concern over a "resurgent" anti-Semitism in Canada.

In Ottawa, CJC's director of government relations, Eric Vernon, briefed Diène, and noted that Canada was not immune to the international upsurge of anti-Semitism in the wake of Palestinian violence against Israel.

"We told the rapporteur that if he wanted to gain insight into the contemporary domestic manifestations of anti-Semitism in Canada, he had to understand this phenomenon in its international and Middle Eastern context.

"We [also] pointed to the distressing breakdown of civil discourse in Canadian society that has created a permissive atmosphere in which legitimate vigorous expressions of political opinions have crossed the line to anti-Semitism," Vernon said.

In a meeting with CJC officials in Quebec a few days later, Diène was told that since the start of the second intifadah, Montreal Jews have seen "a dramatic rise in 'new anti-Semitism,' anti-Semitic hate attacks on Jewish individuals and institutions camouflaged under the guise of political discourse.

"We are witnessing a deterioration of civil dialogue and the creation of an atmosphere where the line between legitimate, even vigorous criticism is regularly crossed. This phenomenon has been seen most clearly on university campuses."

And in a meeting with Diène last Thursday, CJC's Ontario region noted an upsurge in anti-Semitic activity in the province following the 9/11 attacks, and listed several specific incidents on high school and university campuses, synagogues and communal institutions.

"It is no exaggeration to say that there is a miasma that hangs over our community," CJC stated. "Manifestations of anti-Semitism and intolerance, fuelled by events in other parts of the world, have caused many in our community to wonder if the world is girding itself for another eruption of hatred. Hatred of Jews now disguises itself as hatred of the Jewish state, when it bothers to disguise itself at all."

Congress also expressed concern that the provincial Equity in Education Tax Credit, which provides relief for parents of children in private and faith-based day schools, is in danger of being repealed should the Ontario Tories be defeated in this week's election.

Should the credit be eliminated, "once again, Ontario will have an official policy of state-sanctioned religious discrimination. We urge the rapporteur to engage the political leadership in this province in ensuring that it not bring Ontario back to a time where one religious community has more rights and is by extension more equal than any other citizen. It is, simply put, unjust and discriminatory."

B'nai Brith's 21-page brief outlined a litany of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada and described various legal remedies.

Quoting for its annual audit of anti-Semitism in Canada, B'nai Brith noted 459 incidents reported last year, an increase of 61 per cent over the previous year, and the highest amount ever reported in the audit's 20-year history. In the past five years alone, the number of incidents has more than doubled, B'nai Brith stated.

It also noted that studies show many Canadians still believe all Jews are wealthy, despite the fact poverty affects Jews at the same rate as Canadians generally.

Noting that the UN rapporteur had authored a study on the plight of Muslims and Arabs after 9/11, B'nai Brith suggested there is "enough cause for concern" to request he prepare a similar report on the situation of Jews around the world.

"Events in Canada reflect the very real deterioration in the condition of Jewish communities around the world, especially in Western Europe and provide a barometer of the level or racism in Canada in general," B'nai Brith said.

Israel must maintain military superiority: Medzini

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The lesson of the recent war in Iraq is that Israel must continue to maintain its qualitative military superiority over the Arabs, says the former director of the Israel Government Press Office.

In a wide-ranging lecture at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue recently, Meron Medzini said the rapid allied conquest of Iraq proved that a technically sophisticated military machine trumps an army of a million soldiers.

Medzini, a Hebrew University professor, said Israel's deterrent power is much more critical in the wake of that war, given Arab perceptions that Israel possesses the same conventional and non-conventional capabilities as the United States.

As a result of this factor, and Israel's alliance with the United States, adversaries such as Iran and Syria may think twice before becoming embroiled in a showdown with Israel.

With the removal of Saddam Hussein's Ba'athist regime, Israel's strategic position has vastly improved, he said. "There is no threat from the east."

Syria remains a theoretical threat to Israel, Medzini said, but he tempered that observation with the comment that Syria's armed forces have not been modernized since the 1980s.

According to Medzini, the war in Iraq and the Sept. 11 terror attacks have modified the United States' position on two pivotal subjects of great importance to Israel.

Washington now understands the need to dismantle the Palestinians' terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza, and it better appreciates the imperative to launch what Medzini described as preventive wars, "which may be important for Israel in the future."

Medzini, who called Israel's relations with the United States "the key to its security," warned Israel might well deploy non-conventional weapons if "pushed to the wall" by its enemies.

And in a brief survey of U.S. policy in the Mideast, he talked about its basic contradictions.

On the one hand, Washington supports authoritarian regimes in Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Morocco.

On the other hand, it calls for, and tries to foster, democracy in the region.

It is by no means certain that the United States can impose democracy in Iraq, as it did in Japan after World War II. He claimed there is no basis for democracy in Islamic tradition.

Rising U.S. casualties in postwar Iraq may embolden Palestinian terrorists, but in the meantime, Israel has yet to find "an answer" to the low-grade guerrilla war launched by the Palestinians three years ago this week.

He also made the following points:

- For economic reasons, Israel can't afford to mobilize its large armed forces for lengthy periods, and is, therefore, examining the feasibility of downsizing its army.
- Demographic problems could endanger Israel one day; and
- Saudi Arabia, for the first time in its history, has started to fight terrorism on its soil.

ISRAEL WILL NEVER STAND ALONE!

VIGIL FOR TERROR VICTIMS: In a candlelight vigil in Earl Bales Park Sept. 22, more than 50 members of Toronto's Jewish community came together in the pouring rain and driving wind to show their concern for the families of nearly 1,000 Israelis who have died and the 6,000 who have been injured in terror attacks during the last three years. The group paid tribute to the dead and wounded by sharing stories and saying prayers in their honour.

Remarkable heroism

An entire generation has been born and has grown into adulthood since the sirens of war wailed their woeful warning in the cities and countryside of Israel 30 years ago next week. Soldiers were summoned from synagogue in the very midst of their prayers. Military codes calling reservists to arms were announced at regular intervals over the radio. Supply trucks rumbled through the streets, some heading north, some south.

At 2 p.m. on Shabbat Yom Kippur, Oct. 6, 1973, Israel was attacked by the armies of Egypt and Syria. The Jewish state absorbed painfully ferocious blows, counterattacked and eventually gained the upper hand. Hostilities stopped on Oct.22.

Some 2,600 Israeli soldiers were killed; thousands were wounded. A proportionally comparable figure in Canadian terms would be more than 12,500 soldiers killed. A comparable American figure would be more than 125,000 men and women killed.

The enormity of the loss was staggering, an immeasurable toll of suffering and grief that seared permanent sorrow into so many homes and into the nation's anguished soul.

After the war, a great deal of criticism was directed at various levels of Israel's political and military leadership for their failure to have been adequately prepared for the military onslaught across the Suez Canal and in the Golan Heights that Saturday morning, and for the delay in mobilizing the army's full reserves.

Overshadowed somewhat by the shock at the number of lives sacrificed in defence of the country was the singular and sustaining truth that, indeed, because of the sacrifice and countless individual acts of courage, the country had been saved.

In his book The War of Atonement, widely respected military analyst Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Chaim Herzog (who subsequently became the president of Israel) eloquently noted the following: "The inherent strength and resilience of the people of Israel was revealed in the stark grim and tragic days at the outset of the war, when, fighting back against overwhelming odds, they overcame the initial setbacks and achieved military success. I came away from this work imbued with a sense of deep humility in the face of those whose collective story I have tried to tell. No people in the world crave peace more than the people of Israel and yet none are more ready for self-sacrifice should the necessity arise."

The unidentified woman in the photo inset sits beside the grave of a soldier who fell in the Yom Kippur War, perhaps her son or her husband. We cannot know her thoughts, nor fill with our love the space hollowed out in her heart by the loss of someone so dear. We can only promise her and ourselves to remember the remarkable heroism of the soldiers who fought and died so that Israel might live.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

MIAs: Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Tzvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz. KIDNAPPED: Elchanan Tannenbaum.

Invitation to Netanya

I realized I've been remiss in not communicating with my old community all these years. I am very active in the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI) here in Netanya and I just recently read their constitution and realized our job is to tell others about our organization and Israel. AACI is involved in every aspect of daily life here in Netanya. Our community centre is a hive of activity and has a broad spectrum of programs that make Israel a home away from home for our members.

I invite the Toronto delegation of this year's General Assembly, which will be held in Israel this November, to put Netanya on its agenda. Pay a visit to our Mo'adon and get the feel of living here. We welcome each and every one. See you in November in Netanya by the sea.

Arafat should be tried

Life is simple, but people make it complex.

If the Israelis captured Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, they could put him up for trial as a terrorist in The Hague (as former Serbian president Slobodan Milosevic is being tried for war crimes). The guilty verdict would be a major deterrent to other terrorist leaders.

In praise of Asper

Israel Asper's address at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue late this summer was both heartwarming and heartbreaking ("Asper belittles road map to peace; calls on Israel to withdraw from it," CJN, Aug. 7).

It was heartwarming because Asper is a man who has the wisdom and dedication of a David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir and Menachem Begin.

In his eloquent address, he clearly described the true Palestinian strategy to annihilate the Jewish state and its people.

It was heartbreaking, because, as Asper said, Israel is always encouraged to act with restraint and to give more and more concessions while the Palestinians break every rule in the book. The Palestinians are consumed with hate. I still weep over the terrorist massacre of the 11 Israeli Olympic athletes in Munich in 1972.

Asper's recommendation to just walk away from the road map peace plan is sound advice. The Palestinians are never going to let Israel live in peace.

Zerker in denial

Prof. Sally Zerker simply cannot understand why the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin signed the Oslo accords, nor why Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has released Palestinian prisoners as part of the road map peace plan ("Israel's appeasement habits," CJN, Aug. 7). Seeking an answer, she talks with a rabbi, looks at the writings of Harold Innis and concludes that the Israelis are afflicted with the "spirit of shtetl yiddin," which leads them to "appease" the Palestinians.

Of course, another way to explain these events is to place them in a political context, which is where they belong. Israel has been negotiating with the Palestinians for a long time because the issues of the settlements, jurisdiction over Jerusalem, the right of return of Palestinian refugees and the boundaries and conditions of Palestinian statehood are a matter of dispute. Zerker may not like it, but public opinion, more so in Israel than in Canada, feels that there is some justice in the Palestinian cause despite the despicable suicide bombings and that the current conflict can only be settled through negotiations. Characterizing negotiations as "appeasement" and denigrating Israelis in terms of a ghetto mentality demonstrates not only a misunderstanding, but a complete denial of the political process.

Sharon sounds like Hamas

Why is the Israeli government acting like Hamas? With its talk of revenge and punishment, its targeted assassinations, and its recent pronouncement on Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and company sound and behave like Hamas and its suicide killers. We all know that Hamas is determined to destroy any chance for peace, but why an Israeli government should behave in such a provocative, counterproductive fashion is incomprehensible.

Is Barbie a Jew?

Arab anti-Semitism has finally gone off the charts.

The Saudi government's hallucinatory view that Barbie dolls are Jewish tools (News in Brief, CJN, Sept. 18) designed to promote the lewd behaviour of a "perverted western world" leads one to wonder if their next form of insanity will be to examine Ken for circumcision.

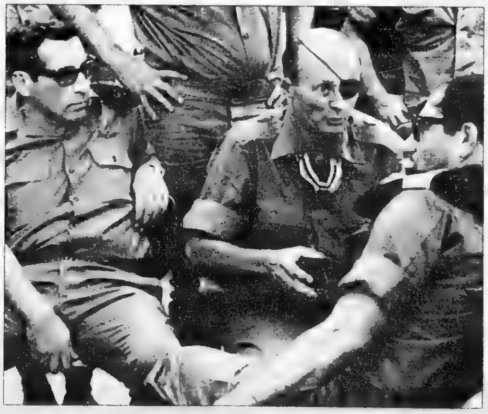
Scenes from the Yom Kippur War

The Yom Kippur War began 30 years ago this week, on Oct. 6, 1973. Clockwise from top middle, Egyptian forces cross Israel's Bar Lev defensive line along the Suez Canal after overwhelming undermanned Israeli forces on the first day of the war; an Israeli Skyhawk fighter supports ground soldiers attacking the Syrian army two days into the conflict; medics tend to wounded in an Israeli first-aid centre on the west side of the Suez Canal; Israeli chief of staff David Elazar, right, arrives in the Golan Heights with Yitzchak Rabin, former chief of staff and former ambassador to the United States; defence minister Moshe Dayan, centre, speaks with generals Rechavam Ze'evi and Shmuel Gonen in the Sinai on the second day of the war; Gen. Ariel Sharon, commander of the western forces in Sinai, talks to still-mobilized troops after the war in November 1973; Israeli forces on a bridge across the Suez used in a key offensive counter-thrust against Egypt; Israeli Gen. Aharon Yariv and Egyptian Gen. General Mohamed Abdel Ghani al-Gamasy during armistice talks in Sinai in December 1973.



The ups and downs of running in Jerusalem

It's tough running in Jerusalem. The city is built on hills that are hard on the legs and segments of its pavement are made of stone that can be slippery and uneven. And beware the Israeli driver, who is certainly not accommodating when it comes to sharing the road with runners – or pedestrians, for that matter.

Lawrence Hart
in Hamilton

But aside from the challenge of maintaining your balance and avoiding injury, running at dawn alongside the walls of the Old City and taking in the sunrise and the breathtaking views of the Hinnom and Kidron valleys is an experience that is as unique as it is exhilarating.

What is so terribly sad, however, is that the streets that are so deserted at break of day do not get much busier as the day wears on. I was in Israel in early September as part of a mission with Jewish National Fund, and though our guide told us that tourism had begun to improve since the declaration of the so-called hudna, there seemed to be very little evidence of the recovery that many Israelis had anticipated.

To make matters worse, we were there at the same time Mahmoud Abbas tendered his resignation as Palestinian prime minister and the devastating bombings occured in Rishon Lezion and Jerusalem's German colony. The country went on a state of high alert and a population that has for so long been traumatized by the cowardly insanity of suicide bombers had to deal with yet another terrorist onslaught.

My morning runs in Jerusalem took me into the heart of the shopping district, along Jaffa Road and up Ben Yehuda Street. This area has certainly had its share of terrorist-provoked horrors in the past few years, but so too have other parts of the city and country. The locations of many of these atrocities have become memorials to a war that is unlike any other Israel has ever had to fight.

Given current realities, it's hard to believe that the road map peace plan, or any other similar plan, will bring stability to the region anytime soon. Instead, it may well be that separation, by way of the much-debated security fence, is the only way to deter, if not prevent, further attacks.

As always, I am hoping to return to Jerusalem in the not-too-distant future. And I am looking forward to again running the byways of that ancient city – and happily contending with its hills and the idiosyncrasies of its hot-headed drivers. But I dread the prospect of passing new sites where more Israelis have by then become the latest victims of terrorist barbarity.

Fielding an impossible question

A few weeks ago, on the night of the horrific terrorist attack on Café Hillel in Jerusalem, my wife and I received a phone call from our friend Norma in Detroit. It was close to 1 a.m. She and her husband Michael and their four young children were set to leave the next day for a 10-day visit to Israel.

Robert Sarner
in Jerusalem

Norma was distraught. In addition to her sadness over this latest atrocity and her concern for our wellbeing, she and Michael were torn about what to do. After months of eagerly awaiting the trip, which was to include a friend's wedding in Rishon Lezion, they were now on the verge of cancelling it.

Even before this latest suicide bombing in Jerusalem and another earlier in the day near Rishon Lezion, many people had discouraged them from coming. Some told them outright they were crazy, if not irresponsible, to subject their children to such a perilous situation.

Since the Palestinians launched their terrorist war three years ago, many countries have issued travel advisories warning their citizens against visiting Israel. Hundreds of thousands of people have cancelled trips, decimating Israel's tourism industry.

"Robert, tell me honestly," Norma beseeched me. "You know how much we were looking forward to this trip. But with the situation seemingly getting even worse, do you think we should come?"

This was not the first time friends overseas have called or e-mailed me with such a question. In recent years, most Israelis with friends and relatives abroad have been asked the same thing.

"I can't really answer that," I told her. "If you want, we can talk statistics and I could tell you it's far more dangerous to drive on Israel's highways than to go to a local café or restaurant. I could say it's riskier going downtown in Detroit than walking around the centre of Jerusalem or Tel Aviv. But the issue of course is not numbers."

This didn't really help Norma resolve her dilemma, but I couldn't answer any other way.

"Of course, we would love to see you here," I said. "But we will never tell you that you should come. It's a personal matter. The situation here obviously is not good and not everyone can deal with such tensions and risks, especially if they're travelling with children."

I explained to Norma why her question, though perfectly understandable, was impossible to answer. "Imagine I should convince you and your family to come and something terrible happens. I'd never forgive myself for the rest of my life."

It's strange to think that I live in a place most people abroad are afraid to visit. Even more unsettling is how many Israelis won't come to Jerusalem for fear of terrorist attacks.

Norma said she and Michael were seriously considering calling the trip off. I told her I would respect their decision either way. The conversation ended with her trip still very much up in the air.

The next time we spoke, Norma, Michael and their children were in Tel Aviv and as happy as could be. A few days later, we welcomed them to our home for dinner, and they waxed near-euphoric about their time in Israel.

They explained how their respective parents, especially his, had strongly urged them not to come to Israel. They spoke of how almost no one in Detroit said to them before they left, "Have a nice time." Rather, most said, "Come back safely."

They spoke of how many Israelis had thanked them for coming at such a difficult time. They lamented that the tourist sites they visited were so deserted. They told us of their Israeli friends in Tel Aviv who refused to join them at our home for dinner because they were afraid to come to Jerusalem.

As I write this, Norma and her family are at Ben-Gurion Airport preparing to fly home. Earlier in the evening, when we called to say goodbye, Norma was extremely emotional. She said this had been the best, most rewarding trip she and Michael had ever taken and that they can't wait to come back again.

I wondered what would have happened had I advised her not to come when she called two weeks earlier.

Begin and Camp David: a fresh look

Twenty-five years ago, the leaders of Israel, Egypt and the United States met in the seclusion of Camp David and emerged after 12 difficult days with the framework for the most important Middle East agreement to date.

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

Since then, the appreciation of this achievement has grown, particularly in contrast to the catastrophic failure of other peace efforts. Since 1973, Israel and Egypt have not fought any wars, and while Cairo's policy of "cold peace" has become a "cold war," it is still better than the violence of the pre-treaty period.

To celebrate this achievement, many of the surviving participants gathered at the Jimmy Carter Center in Georgia to sing the praises of the former U.S. president. Unfortunately, neither Menachem Begin nor Anwar Sadat are alive to share the spotlight. As a result, Carter's spin machine continues to churn out the version that transformed the American president into the main hero of the piece and the Camp David Accords as his major success. In histories based on American sources, Carter is given most of the credit, along with Sadat, while Begin is depicted as a stubborn and argumentative partner, at best.

However, as more details become known, Begin's central role stands out, while Carter's claims as a peacemaker have become increasingly questionable. Indeed, it would not be an exaggeration to say that the peace treaty was signed despite Carter's ignorance, his patronizing attitude, and, in particular, his strategy of attempting to divide Begin and Sadat. In contrast to the Israeli and Egyptian leaders, Carter faced few political risks or difficult decisions in this process.

Sadat's surprise visit to Jerusalem in November 1977 got the ball rolling, and for this, the murdered Egyptian's contribution to peace is unquestionable. But then he sat back, issuing demands and expecting that Begin would reciprocate by accepting the Egyptian positions. Begin, however, understood that a stable and lasting peace would require more than grand gestures and one-sided concessions.

In addition to a total Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai, Sadat, supported by Carter, demanded an end to the Israeli presence in the West Bank regions of Judea and Samaria and Jerusalem's Old City. For Begin, this was unacceptable.

It fell to Begin to decide how to maintain the momentum generated by Sadat's visit while preserving his own ideological commitments.

For the Israeli critics on the left, there was no dilemma – peace would simply come with Israel's withdrawal to the 1949 armistice lines and the creation of a Palestinian state. For the Israeli right, including Begin's closest political supporters in Herut and Likud, maintaining full Israeli control in Judea and Samaria was far more important than any unreliable peace offer. Begin realized that a balance between both objectives was needed, and he successfully navigated this difficult path.

But the Americans, and Carter in particular, were blind to the difficult decisions Begin faced. The pragmatic president was incapable of understanding Begin's deep commitment to Jewish history and the Zionist renaissance. (Despite clear indications of a likely Begin victory in the 1977 election, Washington was taken by surprise at the outcome, and in relying on Labor Party opponents and their American contacts for analysis, this gap in American understanding was never filled.)

Whenever Begin tried to guide Carter through these issues, the Americans would lose patience. But without this understanding, Carter and his Middle East advisors could not appreciate Begin's skilled balancing act, which allowed him to disarm domestic critics and shepherd the negotiations to a successful end.

Carter's simplistic belief that Palestinian self-determination would lead to peace, rather than terror, almost destroyed the negotiations. Carter also frequently distorted Begin's words, particularly regarding Palestinian autonomy. For example, in the last session of the Camp David summit, Carter claimed that Begin agreed to an indefinite freeze on settlement construction, meaning eventual abandonment of Judea and Samaria. This was not credible, and Begin was right to distrust Carter. Nevertheless, Begin held his anger in check and did not sever ties or end the talks.

All three leaders deserve credit for this singular accomplishment, and the attempt to deprive Begin of his central role is both demeaning and historically wrong.

Israel faces spectre of an Arab fifth column

Three years ago this week, just days after the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising, the foundations of Israel's coexistence with its Arab citizens were shaken profoundly by a short-lived insurrection.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Animated by pent-up feelings of discrimination, galvanized by sympathy for their fellow Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and outraged over Ariel Sharon's highly publicized visit to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, unarmed Israeli Arabs from Jaffa to Acre and from Umm al-Fahm to Nazareth went on an unprecedented rampage. They staged demonstrations, closed roads, stoned police, vandalized public buildings, trashed vehicles, toppled light standards and shouted, "Death to Jews."

Scrambling to quell the widespread riots, Israel's security forces fired on the protesters, killing 12 Israeli Arabs and one Jordanian Palestinian. Amid the chaos, a Jewish motorist driving near Haifa was killed by a rock flung by an Arab assailant. Flabbergasted by the scale and ferocity of the disturbances, Ehud Barak, the then prime minister, appointed a special commission of inquiry, led by Supreme Court justice Theodor Orr, to investigate and draw conclusions. Last month, the panel released its findings: The police had used excessive force in dispersing the rioters, and "the government's approach to the Arab sector was in large part characterized by neglect and discrimination."

We have heard this before. Israeli Arabs, an increasingly vocal and militant minority of 1.2 million, have long complained of police insensitivity and brutality. In 1976, in the last serious outbreak of its kind, six Israeli Arabs were killed by police.

More to the point, as the Orr Commission duly noted, the government has not closed the yawning Arab-Jewish gap. Israeli Arabs lag far behind Israeli Jews in terms of budgetary allocations for municipalities, schools and industrial development, and they chafe under an inferior standard of living. This is no longer startling news. Last year, for example, the State Comptroller disclosed that 58 of 82 Arab towns and villages still do not have a complete sewage system in place.

Of all the Arabs, the Bedouin are the most disadvantaged. In an essay last year, Moshe Arens, Israel's former defence minister, wrote that in the fields of education, the economy and housing, they are at "the bottom" of the barrel. And he added: "Many of them live in 'unrecognized' clusters, while being denied the basic services due to all the country's citizens."

In the aftermath of the October 2000 Israeli Arab riots, the government approved a $1-billion (US) development plan for the Arab community, but implementation was delayed and Arab leaders claimed it was not nearly enough.

Israel's expropriation of Arab-owned lands, the spark of the 1976 incident, has also engendered bitterness, as has the fact that very few Arabs serve on the boards of state-run corporations or teach at universities.

In 1970, four years after the Israeli government lifted military rule over Arab localities, Israel promised to integrate Israeli Arabs on "the basis of full equality." A small group of Israeli Arabs, particularly the Druze, have reaped the fruits of this lofty pronouncement. But in general, Israeli Arabs definitely consider themselves second class citizens.

Israeli Arabs, the descendants of about 160,000 Palestinians who did not join the flight of Arabs from Israel during the 1948 War of Independence, are torn between two poles: their loyalty to Israel and their identification with Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. Israeli Arabs were once seen as Israel's bridge to the Palestinians, but no longer. As a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict, and the common perception that they do not enjoy equal citizenship with Jews, Israeli Arabs have grown disaffected and alienated. "There is growing radicalization within the Arab sector in Israel," Israeli President Moshe Katsav warned recently.

Under the influence of Arab parliamentarians such as Azmi Bishara of the Balad party, Israeli Arabs have begun calling for a secular state in place of Israel ("a state of its citizens") and rejecting core Zionist symbols from the Magen David flag to the Hatikvah national anthem.

In keeping with pre-state tradition and practice, Israeli Arabs generally live physically apart from Jews. But in last January's general election, Arabs took one further step to separate themselves from Jews. They voted almost unanimously for Arab candidates representing Arab parties. Until 15 years ago, Arabs cast their ballots only for Zionist parties. But since 1988, when the first all-Arab party was founded, they have gradually shifted their allegiance to Arab parties. "The connection between the Arab public and the Zionist parties has simply been wiped out," says Eli Reches, a Tel Aviv University specialist in Israeli Arab affairs.

This is an extremely important, but often overlooked, point. Arnon Soffer, a Haifa University demographer, has observed that if Israeli Arabs were ever to vote as a bloc, they could elect 21 Knesset members. (They now have less than a dozen). And in 2020, when Israeli Arabs are expected to comprise 25 percent of Israel's population, they could theoretically elect 30 MKs.

The implications trouble Israel's elite. If united as a bloc, Israeli Arab parliamentarians could tip the balance in pivotal debates about domestic and foreign policy, changing Israel's complexion and direction. The fear that Israel's Jewish character could ineradicably be altered by the fecund Arab birthrate has prompted discussions around the idea that certain heavily Arab-populated areas in Israel – notably Wadi Ara – should be included in a future Palestinian state. Shlomo Avineri, a Hebrew University political scientist and former director general of Israel's foreign ministry, believes that a land swap with the Palestinians would relieve the demographic anxieties of Jews and satisfy the aspirations of Palestinian nationalists.

The Israeli Arab town of Umm al-Fahm

But this is easier said than done. Judging by surveys, most Israeli Arabs would oppose the transfer of Wadi Ara to Palestinian control. It would be a costly exercise, depriving them them of social benefits, a fairly high standard of living and the political freedoms to which they have become accustomed since 1948.

For these pragmatic reasons, the overwhelming majority of Israeli Arabs, their vocal complaints notwithstanding, are outwardly loyal to Israel. Scarcely any have cast their lot with terrorism, despite the best efforts of Hamas and Hezbollah to recruit them. But the few who have bucked the trend have sown suspicions that Israeli Arabs are basically fifth columnists who must be ceaselessly watched.

Partly in response to these fears, the Israeli government has decreed that Palestinians who marry Israeli citizens cannot reside in Israel or apply for citizenship. In a previous measure that was subsequently withdrawn, Israel revoked the citizenship of Israeli Arabs indicted as terrorists. Concerned by recent developments, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has speculated that the completion of Israel's security fence through the West Bank will prompt Hamas and like-minded organizations to seek out more Israeli Arab recruits.

Prior to the eruption of the second intifadah in September 2000, the gravest terrorist incident involving Israeli Arabs was the arrest of four men who tried to blow up commuter buses in Haifa and Tiberias. They belonged to the Islamic Movement, whose northern branch has been accused of sedition by Israel. Since then, the number of Israeli Arabs who have participated in terrorism has grown incrementally. In 2001, a resident of an Arab village in northern Israel detonated a bomb in Nahariya's train station, killing himself and two others. In the same year, a handful of Umm-al Fahm residents were arrested after being recruited into a Hamas suicide squad.

The most shocking case in 2002 was the arrest of Lt. Col. Omar al-Kheib, a Bedouin charged with spying for Hezbollah. Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, dismissed it as an aberration. But long before the al-Kheib case broke, Israel was busy rounding up Israeli Arab traitors. Some examples: Seven Israeli Arabs were arrested after being accused of assisting a Hamas suicide bomber who blew up a bus. A Jaffa taxi driver was sentenced to 15 years in prison for transporting terrorists to Tel Aviv. Three men from Ramle were detained on suspicion of planning to leave bombs at soldiers' hitchhiking stations. Two men from Lod and a woman from Nazareth were charged with maintaining ties with Hamas.

There has been no letup this year. Five senior members of the Islamic Movement, including the mayor of Umm al-Fahm, were charged with transferring funds to illegal organizations in the territories. Seven residents of two Galilee villages were detained for planning to kidnap a soldier and smuggle in a suicide bomber from the West Bank. And the list goes on.

It seems clear that unless the grievances of Israeli Arabs are seriously addressed, and very soon, Israel will have a chronic and monumental security problem on its hands.

High Holy Days – hello or goodbye?

By RABBI CHANANYA MOSHE BERZON

Rabbinic Reflections

Every month of the Jewish calendar we bless the new moon. This brief service, called Kiddush Levana, is recited between the third night and the middle of the lunar month. For the month of Tishrei, the overwhelming majority of Jews delay blessing the new moon until after the concluding Yom Kippur prayer Neilah. Following the sounding of the shofar, and Ma'ariv and Havdalah in many congregations, people gather outside the shul and recite the blessing.

Yom Kippur falls on the 10th day of Tishrei. The night of the Neilah service is the 11th. Therefore, in essence, we could have blessed the new moon during the previous seven days. So why procrastinate until the end of the High Holy Days?

The interpretation generally made is that we wish to begin the New Year on the right foot – that is, by observing an additional mitzvah – in this case, the blessing of the new moon. Following this logic, we build and decorate the sukkah after we break our fast and have eaten our meal. We could have built the sukkah a few days earlier. But we wait until after Yom Kippur to show that we are starting the New Year with mitzvot.

It might seem logical that observing these mitzvot would be more appropriate during the days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, when judgment for our deeds throughout the past year are being weighed on the scale in front of the court of the King of Kings. We should really "pile on" as many mitzvot as we can to tip the scales in our favour. Why wait until after our trial has been concluded and the verdict has been decreed? In other words, why worry about the New Year when we first should take care of the past year?

I think the answer to this question contains an eloquent and persuasive message. Essentially, we are declaring that the past year is futile without any game plan for the forthcoming New Year. There must be something wrong with my past if I have no plans for the future. I cannot claim remorse for past iniquities if I have not scheduled an upgrade in my behaviour for the future.

> Let us resolve, during this season of repentance, to channel our efforts toward doing mitzvot

I look optimistically toward the New Year. I am conveying a proclamation to my Creator and myself. The message simply is: If HaShem blesses me with another year, I will infuse it with mitzvot. Last year wasn't a banner year. I was not eagerly involved in good deeds. The year flew by without much I can be proud of. However, I have already made plans for next year to begin it on the right foot. So as soon as I leave God's court following the final judgment of Neilah, I will add a few extra mitzvot to my behaviour blueprint. A sincere attitude like this will have a positive impression on the Lord sitting in judgment during these Holy Days.

Let us resolve, during this season of repentance, to channel our efforts toward doing mitzvot. With this decisive mind-set, let us turn to HaShem and ask Him to bless us with a happy and healthy New Year so we will have the frame of mind and the healthy body and spirit to enable us to perform many good deeds.

We finish the year with anticipation for a forthcoming year filled with mitzvot. We are not just saying goodbye to the past year. We are saying hello to the New Year.

May we all be blessed with a Shanah Tovah, a year filled with mitzvot. Amen.

Rabbi Berzon is the spiritual leader of Young Israel of Chomedey in Montreal.

A way out of the mud

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

We are facing a crisis in the Western world of troubling proportions. This is a crisis that has some external signs – the rise of terrorism for example – but it is mostly an internal predicament. It has to do with the sense of purposelessness and drift felt in many quarters, including Jewish ones.

The other day, I asked students in a Grade 11 class that I teach if it would negatively affect their lives if there were no Jews at all left in the world in a few years.

One girl wondered how this would happen – would it, for example, be the result of a second Holocaust? Would some evil foe come to exterminate us? This bothered her greatly, because no one has the right to harm another person.

I said, "Let's suppose that it wouldn't occur that way. Jews would simply assimilate and lose contact with Judaism until there was no one left in the Jewish people." She thought for a moment and said this would not personally bother her, since, after all, it is merely a personal choice whether or not to practise Judaism and choosing not to is not the same as having somebody such as Hitler come along and taking your choices away.

So, the real problem for her was not the destruction of the Jewish people, but the fact such destruction might be imposed by others. Her view was not necessarily representative of her classmates, but neither was it a totally singular one.

In Jewish communities worldwide, there is plenty of Torah learning going on and lots of mitzvah observance. There are many kosher establishments and mikvahs, synagogues and Holocaust museums, Jewish music and food, and novels and plays. But is there a sense of purpose that comes along with all of this, a knowledge of our task as Jews and the best way to accomplish that task? Of this, I am far less sure.

Part of the problem is that many of us feel religion is something that happens elsewhere, that we are not personally responsible for the destiny of the Jewish people and that others will take care of it.

The founder of Chassidut, the Baal Shem Tov, said the Jewish people are like a living Sefer Torah, and each Jew is like a letter in that Torah. This is not just a way of making each person feel valuable while being irrelevant to the Jewish cause. Every time a Jew drops out of Judaism, every time we forego a spiritual decision and make a temporal one, we block the revelation of God's word. It's as if Torah is a mansion with an infinite amount of doors, and every Jew has a key to a different door. The house cannot be fully opened unless we all participate.

It is to this ultimate sense of mission that the High Holy Days speak.

They are not about blame. They are not about piety. They are not about what I can't do, won't do or might do. They are not about dressing up, speeches, the length of prayers, beautiful voices or heavenly choirs.

They are simply about whether my life will become one of direction and find its way out of the Western mud into the Jewish stars.

May our prayers turn into deeds, our deeds into love, our love into change, our change into wholeness, and our wholeness into redemption.

The New Joys of Yiddish*, by Leo Rosten, revised by Lawrence Bush, Random House, $27 paperbound.

On a bus in Tel Aviv, a mother was talking animatedly, in Yiddish, to her little boy – who kept answering her in Hebrew. And each time the mother said, "No, no, talk Yiddish!" An impatient Israeli, overhearing this, exclaimed, "Lady, why do you insist the boy talk Yiddish instead of Hebrew?" Replied the mother, "I don't want him to forget he's a Jew."

That mother knows what Israel Zangwill meant when he wrote, in 1906: "Yiddish incorporates the essence of a life which is distinctive and unlike any other."

Although the beginnings of Yiddish go back to the 13th century, the language did not really flourish until after the 15th century, when the Jews left western Europe for eastern Europe – Poland, Galicia, Hungary, Romania – and Russia. There the buoyant tongue picked up new locutions, adapting itself to the street and the marketplace.

The author insists that this isn't a book about Yiddish. Rather, it explores a fascinating aspect of English: "Those words and phrases from Yiddish (some I call 'Yinglish,' some 'Ameridish') that we today encounter in English books, magazines, newspapers; or hear on television or radio, in movies or nightclubs; or may overhear on the street or in a bus in many a large city in the United States.

"By 'Yinglish,' I mean Yiddish words that are used in colloquial English: kibitzer, mish-mash, bagel, etc.

"By 'Ameridish,' I mean words coined by, and indigenous to, Jews in the United States: kochaleyn, holdupnik, shmegegge, etc."

A sharapnikel, the book explains, is a small object that provides a shutting up – hence a baby's pacifier.

The New Joys of Yiddish provides a lexicon of words from A to Z, usually with accompanying jokes, anecdotes and historical or interpretive material.

The word "bris" for example, leads to the explanation that Sephardi Jews often name a child after a living relative, but the Ashkenazim have a distinct and abiding dread of doing so. A certain trepidation is felt by traditional parents when a young man or woman selects a mate who bears the same given name as a living parent. (In some cases of this sort, the bride- or groom-to-be will adopt a second name or nickname.)

We also learn that Jews adjusted biblical names to the orthography of the language in their country of residence: Yosef (Joseph) appears as Yussuf, Giuseppe, Beppo, Peppo, Jose, Pepe, Popito, Josko, Joska and Joey.

A yold is a simpleton, a fool, a boob, a yokel, a harmless dolt, one whose gullibility and naivete get him into trouble. He is a man who walks into a friend's antique shop and calls out, "Hello! What's new?"

The word "bagel" gave rise to the Yiddish expression, "Er ligt in der erd un bakt bagel," readily translated as "He lies in the ground and bakes bagels." But what does that mean? "He's not doing so well, poor chap."

A man from Mars landed in Manhattan, entered a bakery and asked the owner: "What are those little wheels in the window?" "Wheels? What wheels?" The Martian pointed. "Those aren't wheels." The balebos smiled. "They're called bagels. We eat them… Here, try one." The Martian bit into a bagel and smacked his lips. "Man! This would go great with cream cheese and lox."

Show some seichl and quickly obtain a copy of this book – it's a mechaye as well as a metziye.

Yizkor resources on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

It is one of the most solemn moments of the Yom Kippur service and the entire Jewish calendar. The chazzan and the congregation rise to recite Yizkor and commemorate parents, family and friends who have passed away. To help bring meaning and understanding to the Yizkor service, here are some valuable resources available on the World Wide Web.

Yizkor, which means "He shall remember," was originally recited only on Yom Hakippurim, which literally means the "Day of Atonements." As the Orthodox Union site points out, this phrase is in the plural and refers to the atonement for the living and atonement for the dead. [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/yizkor/laws.htm]

Chancellor Ismar Schorsch of the Jewish Theological Seminary explains how this memorial prayer has also become associated with the holidays of Shmini Atzeret, Passover and Shavuot. [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/parashah/5761/yizkor.shtml]

There are many Web sites that do a good job of presenting the text of the prayer, but I think the best is ORT's Yizkor Online Memorial. The prayer is presented in the original Hebrew, in English, and in an English transliteration for people who need a bit of assistance. If you need more help, click on the link and listen to Yizkor being recited. [http://yizkor.ort.org/html/yizkor.shtml]

Following the recitation of Yizkor, the prayer K'El Maleh Rachamim (God Full of Mercy) is recited. Many congregations have adopted the practice of reciting versions of K'El Maleh Rachamim to remember victims of the Holocaust and to honour the memory of the men and women who have given their lives in defence of Israel. "God full of mercy who dwells on high, grant proper rest in the wings of Your Divine Presence in the lofty abode of the holy, pure and valiant who shine as the brightness of the heavens to the souls of the soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces…"

Since many prayer books do not include both these prayers or contain varying texts, you may want to print out the version found at this site and distribute it in your synagogue or temple. The Orthodox Union's Yizkor Section has another very good version of all these prayers. [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/yizkor/]

Who should stay in the room while Yizkor is being recited? How soon after the death of a relative should the prayer be said? You can find answers to questions about Yizkor customs and traditions at both the Orthodox Union site and at Jewish Virtual Library. Both have very good summaries of Yizkor traditions. [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/yizkor.html]

Rabbi Rafi Rank answers common questions surrounding the tradition of lighting a Yizkor candle. [http://www.jewishpost.com/jp0903/jprabbi0903c.htm]

Rabbi Goldie Milgram suggests that aside from just lighting a candle, this is the ideal time to involve children in remembering a relative who has passed away. After you light the candle, she recommends passing around a photo of the person being remembered. Then share a story about that person's life and his/her meaning in your own life. [http://www.rebgoldie.com/yizkor.htm]

As you browse through the Yizkor-related sites, you see reference to an interesting character: the so-called "Yizkor Jew." Once chided for appearing in synagogue only for the Yizkor service and making a quick exit afterward, the Yizkor Jew, as several sites point out, is making fewer forays into the synagogue today. [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/yizkor/yizkorjew.htm]

Rabbi Harold Shulweis says the reason is obvious. Yizkor is no fun. Why think about death or attend Yizkor when there are so many more pleasurable things you could be doing? Rabbi Shulweis suggests that reciting Yizkor and experiencing pain are essential because learning demands suffering. He draws on a 2,500-year-old quote from the Greek poet Aeschylus. "He who learns must suffer, and even in our sleep, pain that cannot forget falls drop by drop upon the heart, and in our despair, against our will, comes wisdom to us by the awful grace of God." [http://www.vbs.org/rabbi/hshulw/tragedy_bot.htm]

Then Rabbi Shulweis concludes, "Yizkor, yahrtzeit, Kaddish and the K'El Maleh are not fun. But they are the way that the wisdom of memory finds meaning in life."

The ongoing turmoil in the Middle East, which has spilled over into the West ever since September 11th, 2001, continues to command our attention. Artist's life was 'pendulum from despair to hope'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Obituary: Ernest Raab

Ernest Raab, an internationally renowned sculptor, artist, poet, writer, and Talmudic scholar, died Aug. 22. He was 77.

Among his many other works, Raab created the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial and the monument to Raoul Wallenberg in Earl Bales Park, a bas relief at Beth Tzedec Congregation and the stained glass windows at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, as well as sculptures of Einstein, Churchill, Ben-Gurion and works in commercial buildings, other synagogues and hospitals.

Raab was born in Komarom, Czechoslovakia, one of seven children. His mother and father each had 12 brothers and sisters. Most perished in the Holocaust, along with Raab's grandparents, much of his extended family, his teachers and his classmates. Only Raab and four of his siblings survived.

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David, who gave an eulogy for Raab at his funeral, said, "For Raab, beauty was everywhere."

Raab, he noted, also had a deep knowledge of Jewish sources. "His knowledge of Bible was thorough, as was his grasp of Rabbinic midrash and Aggadah."

After the war, Raab settled in Paris, where he studied art. He later moved to Montreal and then to Toronto.

In 1999, Raab published his autobiography, Violin of Stone, which tells of his painful teenage years, his experience as a slave labourer, his escape from a work camp, his life as a partisan, his relationship with Chassidism and Zionism, and his struggle to find meaning in life and retain his beliefs.

"Ernest, like so many of his generation, survivors of the Holocaust, moved back and forth from the extreme cynicism and denial of God to all encompassing hope in the next generation and appreciation for God's blessings," said his nephew, Simon Raab. "Ernest's life was this pendulum from despair to hope and back."

Rabbi Scheim said, "Through Ernie's life work, through his writing, his sculpture, his art, his personality, we have evidence of the eternity of the Jewish spirit." He concluded that "Earnest Raab used his gift to remind each and every one of us of our need to work for a better tomorrow, of our potential to bring this world one step closer to godliness."

Raab is survived by his daughter Sylvia and son-in-law Jean Francois; granddaughters Olivia, Alexandra, Celia, and Margaline; brother Alex Raab and sister-in-law Jenine Raab; and sisters Edith Werner and Lily Bernhaut. His sister Klara Reitman died two years ago.

Cutting through the confusion

By LESLIE GALES

In this New Year of 5764, confusion seems to fill our world. In Israel and around the globe, terrorists who kill men, women and tiny children at the flick of a switch are praised by millions of followers. Surviving victims of terror are valiantly trying to put their lives back together, while Israel, beset by never-ending security concerns, struggles to find the funds to assist them.

Yet despite all the confusion, for Jews everywhere, these are days when clarity is important. According to Jewish tradition, the sound of the shofar must be crisp and clear, returning us to the timeless Jewish values to which our remarkable community has always adhered.

In just over a month since its launch, UJA Federation Campaign 2004 has begun to respond to the needs of Israel and the Jewish world. We have already raised more than $31 million. Proceeds from the campaign will be allocated to victims of terror, Israel's devastated social service network, the fight against worldwide anti-Semitism and training for students that will help them answer those who preach anti-Israel hatred.

Leslie Gales

This November, nearly 300 members of our community will be participating in B'yachad, one of the largest missions to Israel ever, and attending the General Assembly in Jerusalem with 3,000 other world Jewish leaders.

This summer has been a time of intense activity for the new Israel Emergency Cabinet, under the auspices of UIA Federations Canada. Aggressively combating anti-Semitism in all its forms and increasing Canadian support for Israel are among the cabinet's most important objectives. The cabinet has proposed organizational realignment to strengthen Jewish advocacy in Canada on behalf of Israel and other issues of urgent Jewish concern, and it has provided substantial funding for reinvigorated campus programming for Jewish students.

Recently, the UJA Federation board of directors approved a funding increase of $1 million for Jewish education, for a total of $11 million, with $8 million designated as subsidies for parents who can't afford full day school tuition. That amount is unprecedented in North America. We are also looking at several creative options to deal with tuition fee increases.

The Jewish Toronto Tomorrow dream of building three thriving campuses for Jewish life – downtown, in the Bathurst Street-Sheppard Avenue area and north of Steeles in Vaughan – is well underway.

The bright, new Miles Nadal Centre at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue is almost complete, and the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School at the centre is already open. A few minutes south of the Miles Nadal Centre, the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life is taking shape at Harbord and Huron streets.

In York Region, the municipal approval process is in place for plans to develop 50 acres of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow land at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue. The project will include a new Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) campus. In order to prepare for the next steps, we now have an office in Vaughan at Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road.

And more than 70 volunteer leaders are working on plans for the Central Campus Redevelopment Project on the site of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Lipa Green Building on north Bathurst Street. A new, world-class central campus structure will house eight centres of excellence.

On behalf of the UJA Federation family, it is my pleasure to wish you, your loved ones and Jews everywhere a happy, healthy and peaceful New Year.

Leslie Gales is chair of the board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Family of Iraqi immigrants begins new life in Israel

By YUVAL DROR, HA'ARETZ

In the dead of night, a group of 17 new immigrants, mostly from one family, recently arrived in Israel from Iraq.

In 2000, Rachel Nissan and her husband Amir, both from Baghdad, secretly immigrated to Israel just days after they were married. "From the minute we got here, we started to find out how we could take care of the family we left behind," says 26-year-old Amir, who serves as the family's spokesman, but cannot give details on how he reached Israel or how the 17 new immigrants were brought over.

The 17 include his wife's parents, Avraham and Tikva, four of their daughters, two sons and a nephew all aged under 18. Another one of -Rachel's sisters immigrated with her husband and their five children. Amir's uncle also managed to join the special contingent. Amir's brother Assaf managed to get special leave from the army for the occasion. Assaf, who is due to be discharged from the Israel Defense Forces in a few months, came to Israel when he was 16 years old. He says that he managed to get a passport and told the Iraqi authorities he was going on holiday to Jordan. Before leaving Iraq, he got in touch with his grandmother in Israel and told her of his holiday' plans. "I arrived in Jordan at 9 a.m. and by 11:30 a.m. I was in Israel," he says with a broad smile.

The story of how the Nissan family arrived in Israel is a complicated one. Amir says that some 27 years ago, the family left the once-prosperous Baghdad Jewish neighborhood of Bataween and moved in with a Muslim family who tried hard to hide the Jewish family's identity. The father, Avraham, owned a prospeous garage and the family was considered well-to-do. When some of the older children, who had not managed to change their Jewish surnames, applied to university, they were rejected. Avraham says that when the war in Iraq broke out, the neighborhood where the family was living was bombed heavily since the offices of Saddam Hussein's security forces were located nearby. "Many neighbors were killed in those strikes," adds Amir. The family, nonetheless, waited until it was certain that Saddam's regime had fallen. "Only the week after the famous statue was toppled did they flee from home," says Amir. They were scared. He says that they left without anything and so fast that Avraham did not even manage to sell his business. After contacting the Jewish Agency, the family stayed awhile in another Iraqi city and was finally brought to Israel, with a stopover on the way. "Our parents talked about immigrating to Israel ever since we were children," adds Assaf. "The problem is that every time we saved enough money and we planned to leave, a war broke out and when war breaks out in Iraq, no one can leave the country. Once it was the Iran-Iraq war, then the first Gulf War and then the second Gulf War."

Assaf says that had he not managed to escape from Iraq, he would have had to enlist in Saddam's army. "I would have tried to get out of it, though. You pay someone $500 and it would have been sorted out," he says. Amir says he is so excited about his family's arrival, he has not slept a wink since the family arrived from Iraq.

"It's enormously exciting," says Amir. "We've been worried about them since the moment we arrived in Israel and now they are here. We have not seen them for three years. That's a long time. Now we'll be close by," he says.

Israel's harsh economic realities

The Palestinian violence that started in September 2000, has already cost Israel's economy more than $11 billion, according to recent Israeli government statistics. Virtually every resident of Israel, especially those who rely on the country's social service network, which is facing a financial emergency, have felt the direct impact of the severe recession with which Israel is struggling. Proceeds from UJA Federation Campaign 2004 will be allocated to, among other initiatives, preserving vital social services, including additional assistance for victims of terror. The following facts and figures prepared by Keren Hayesod in Israel represent a stark illustration of Israel's economic condition.

- The average Israeli gross salary in January 2002 was NIS 7,000 ($2188 Canadian). In June 2003, it was down to NIS 6,936 ($2167). In the current dire economic situation, many employees have agreed to a cut in their salaries, happy to be able to hold on to their jobs. The crash in salaries is in almost every sector of the market. One quarter of all salaried workers (629,000) earns less than NIS 3,500 ($1100) per month.
- Unemployment now stands at about 300,000.
- According to Israel National Insurance Institute statistics, 210,000 elderly people or every third elderly person doesn't have enough money to buy needed medications.
- A study conducted by the Brookdale Institute, in conjunction with the Ministry of Health and the Israel Center for Disease Control, found that approximately 450,000 households have severe difficulties meeting their most basic needs.

Tough Medicine

In order to deal with this distressing economy, Finance Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has introduced a stringent, new budget. Here are some of its proposed provisions

- The Treasury is seeking a NIS 10 billion ($3.1 billion) cut in government spending.
- About 6,000 IDF (Israel Defense Forces) civilian employees, career soldiers and officers will be fired – including two generals, 12 brigadier generals, 46 colonels and 240 lieutenant colonels. Bases will be closed and the development of new weaponry will be postponed. The cuts are part of a 5-year, $4.7 billion budget reduction program proposed by the Ministry. These changes are the biggest that the IDF has experienced in 55 years.
- Some 1,500 civil servants will be laid off as government units are shut down. No new government workers will be hired during the coming year.
- The price of water will go up by 15% for private homes and industry
- V.A.T. (Value Added Tax, similar to our GST) will remain fixed at 18% instead of going back to 17% as had been promised.
- The fees for higher education will decrease by 10% instead of 14%, as had been promised.
- Existing discounts on municipal taxes for the elderly will be curtailed.
- Health basket services will be cut.
- More stringent conditions for receiving unemployment benefits will be imposed.
- Tax exemptions for people going on early retirement will be cancelled.
- The retirement age for women and men will go up to 67 from 60 and 65 respectively.

Super Week yields super results

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

It was truly a Super Week for UJA Federation Campaign 2004, with $3 million raised from 6,000 people in a massive five-day telethon blitz on behalf of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, which has now raised over $31 million for Israel's victims of terror, financially troubled Israeli social services, the fight against a worldwide rise in anti-Semitism, and training for students to answer those who preach anti-Israel hatred on campus.

Colin Lewis, Chair of UJA Federation Telethons with Shari Wert, said he was amazed by the number of young people who have volunteered to pick up the phones and reach out to community members during Super Week.

"They are full of enthusiasm and energy, and are quite effective canvassers. In many cases, they are following in the tradition of their parents and grandparents. These are our future leaders," he said.

"This is the tradition of tzedakah in action," said Wert. "Telethons raise over $5 million for the annual campaign and we simply couldn't do it without our incredible volunteers. It's a mitzvah to give, and it's even a greater mitzvah to ask others to help those in need."

For volunteer David Weinberg, Super Week is his chance to make a difference in the lives of children in Israel. He brought his daughter, Marni, 5, to help out.

"When I hear about how many kids in Israel live below the poverty line, that's all I need to know. I have three kids of my own. There are so many of us who have so much, and we take so much for granted. But in Israel, it's a very different story. That's why we're here," he said.

"There was such a dynamic and quick pulse beating in that room," said Ron Cuperfain, who was working the phones on Super Sunday. "It is so heartwarming and encouraging to see Jews from all streams of Judaism, and of all ages. When I see 14-year-old kids sitting next to an 80-year-old volunteer, and they are sharing a laugh and helping each other, it really shows you the breadth and width of our remarkable Jewish community."

One group of young volunteers in particular was having a great day on the telephones, with many receiving generous gift increases from those they called. Two of those teens were brother and sister Sheera Kaendal, 15 from CHAT of Richmond Hill, and Jason, an 18-year-old student at Thornhill Secondary School.

"As a teenage girl, what better or more appropriate way could I help others than by talking on the telephone?" asked Sheera. "Volunteering at UJA telethons is the best way of doing community service. It's the most fun. They treat you great here and they really seem to appreciate your effort. It's also a wonderful way to make new friends and spend some time with old ones."

"Absolutely," agreed brother Jason. "It's a very positive and constructive way to spend time, and it's a great environment. But most importantly, of course, is the fact that it gives us all a chance to make a difference in the lives of Israeli people who, unfortunately, need our help now, maybe more than ever before."

Eva's Initiatives honours volunteers

By WENDY LAMPERT

It was a party unlike any other.

At least, that's what the staff and youth at Eva's Phoenix, a long-term shelter and training facility for youth, say about the holiday party organized and thrown by seven UJA Federation Hands on Toronto (HOT) committee volunteers in December 2002.

That's one of the reasons why Eva's Initiatives, the Toronto community organization that runs Eva's Phoenix chose to honour UJA's Alan Keith, Sarit Goldman, Elaine Rapp, Ronit Teschner, Barry Barnett, Betty Gerstein and Michael Long with Awards of Distinction at its Annual General Meeting last month.

Members of HOT, a committee of UJA Federation's Young Adult Division, volunteer on social service projects to help Jews and non-Jews throughout the Greater Toronto Area. Participants believe that hands-on volunteering should accompany financial giving to more effectively assist those in need.

The dedicated group of volunteers planned, cooked and served up a festive meal for 200 at what can be a very difficult time for people at the shelter, said Morag Perkins, Housing Manager for Eva's Phoenix. The Mariott Hotels Business Council donated all the food. "At that party, residents got to see the excellence and opportunities of volunteering. They saw people caring who didn't really have to care," she said.

But the awards were for more than just throwing the party, said Lori Gottleib, Manager of Volunteer Resources for Eva's Initiatives. "UJA first contacted us in 2001, and they have continued the relationship through several events since that time. Their volunteers have shown us that they want to get involved and help us do what we need to do – they add value to what we do, and they have brought an excitement into the Phoenix," she said.

"When it was time to choose award winners for 2002, UJA was an easy choice," said Suganthy Grishnapillay, Site Operations Manager for Eva's Phoenix. "They were amazing – they worked with staff during the holiday season when there was neither time nor resources for a party. It means so much to us," she said.

For Betty Gerstein, one of HOT's current Chairs with Tracey Steyn, the award was a big surprise.

"It was the furthest thing from our minds when we set out to volunteer," she said. "Our satisfaction comes at the end of an event, when we walk away having given our time to help people face to face. The gratification is immediate," she noted.

Gerstein says she was amazed by the Eva's Phoenix facility the first time she went there. "It had a very positive bent that I'd never seen in a youth shelter before. It gave me a real passion for the project."

"It is a pleasure to work with Eva's Phoenix because their philosophy is so consistent with Jewish philosophy, which teaches us the importance of each human being, and that our purpose in life is to constantly better ourselves," said Michael Long, who was Co-chair of HOT at the time.

Lori Gottleib sees the relationship with UJA Federation as a partnership that benefits everyone involved. "UJA Federation volunteers are no longer strangers working with us. It's friends working together."

From Washington to Super Week

Richard Diamond, Chair of the recent UJA Federation Washington Fly-In along with Mark Waldman and Josh Cooper, was all ears last week as he took to the phones for UJA Federation's Super Week in support of Campaign 2004 - For Israel and the Jewish World. Participants from the Fly-In held a reunion during Super Week at the Lipa Green Building. "When you're involved in Jewish community work, there's never one time that's the beginning or the end; it's an ongoing process," said Diamond. "After all, we're all shareholders in UJA, so tonight was just a natural extension of what we did when we were in Washington."

Caring for the isolated at holiday time

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

The High Holidays are a time for reflection and a time to spend with family and friends.

For most of us, celebrating a Jewish holiday or bringing Jewish music into our lives is a personal decision. However, for many elderly and infirm, these choices depend on the services offered by their nursing or retirement homes.

The Community Chaplaincy service, funded by UJA Federation, and under the auspices of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), understands these religious and cultural ties and the loneliness experienced by Jewish nursing home residents, hospital patients, and prisoners.

Under the direction of Rabbi Ronald Weiss, Director of Chaplaincy Services, and Laila Clein Friedman, Coordinator of Chaplaincy Services, individual volunteers and groups visit hospitals, nursing homes, extended care facilities and prisons.

JF&CS Chaplaincy Services currently boasts 119 active volunteers who visit people in over 100 facilities, primarily, but not exclusively, within the GTA.

It could be a choir from a day school or a group from a synagogue or a father and daughter who have 'adopted' a floor of a retirement home as part of a Bat Mitzvah project. A warm smile, a kind and patient voice, the sound of the shofar bringing a bit of Yiddishkeit to those more limited in their daily lives.

"We're reaching out to people who are culturally, socially or geographically isolated," says Clein Friedman. "That feeling of isolation and solitude is much more noticeable now, during the holidays. One of our biggest challenges is finding volunteers who will visit Jewish residents living in facilities on the fringes of the GTA."

Mike Top, a volunteer chaplain with JF&CS – a partner agency of UJA Federation – has learned plenty about that sense of isolation since he began his volunteerism eight years ago.

Born in Poland, Top, 57, moved to Toronto in 1951 before making aliyah in 1971. While in Israel, Top was a combat soldier with the IDF in Lebanon, before returning to Toronto in 1992. Upon his return, and after helping Israel, Top was ready to help Toronto's Jewish community.

"I asked around to find out who handles Jewish volunteer work, visiting old-age homes, hospitals, prisons, that sort of thing," says Top. "I was told that Jewish Family & Child Service was the place to go, so I did."

Over the years, Top has visited countless facilities, both for the elderly and the infirm, as well as provincial detention centres and correctional facilities. These visits become even more meaningful during this time of the year.

"We do a lot of work during Purim and Rosh Hashanah," says Top. "Especially during the month of Elul, I blow the shofar pretty much wherever I go - with my Rabbi's permission of course – and it always seems to elicit a positive response. Of course, it's always especially interesting when I blow a shofar in a prison. In old folks' homes I'll also dish out the apples and honey, and I'll usually give a bit of an address about the meaning of the holidays."

Top says that regardless of the mental or physical state of those he visits, the holidays and their traditions often break through their handicaps and elicit a response.

"I remember when I used to visit the mental health facility in Whitby," says Top. "There was a grown man there, maybe in his fifties with the mental faculties of a 6-or 7-year-old. As soon as I blew the shofar for him, he would cry. There seemed to be a connection, a rekindling of memories and emotions from growing up with the holidays as a Jewish child."

According to Top, there are three key factors involved in being a successful volunteer.

"You have to be completely non-judgmental, especially visiting prisoners," he says. "You also need to suppress your natural curiosity, and you need to be a really good listener. In fact, the most you can do is listen to these people and hope that you're able to provide them with as much solace as possible."

So why does he do it? Especially visiting the often dark and depressing confines of a prison?

"Why? Because I'm a Jew," he says emphatically. "Our heritage is one of ethical behaviour and the performance of good deeds, in Hebrew, gmilut chasadim, loosely translated as acts of lovingkindness. I prefer a somewhat more correct translation: giving without expectation of return. Sounds corny, but I have no illusions. If I'm making any changes, they are so microscopic as to be virtually undetectable in the grand scheme of things. But each individual in this world changes the world in some fashion. It is up to us, using our free will to choose whether that change will be positive or negative."

Unique website for Jewish job seekers

Responding to many calls from members of Toronto's Jewish community looking for work within Jewish organizations, Doing Jewish in Toronto (DJIT), a component of UJA Federation's website, www.jewishtoronto.net came to the rescue.

Doing Jewish in Toronto is offering a free posting service to help individuals find Jewish organization employment opportunities.

Why consider a job in the Jewish community?

A "Jewish" job contributes to the overall unity of the Jewish people by reaching out to help those in need, teach the young, tend the sick, and feed the poor, as well as by coordinating activities within all of these crucial areas of involvement. In a powerful sense, a career in the field of Jewish education or Jewish communal service is not merely a service to others. It is also a service to yourself, in that it enables you to contribute meaningfully to the ongoing Jewish welfare, education and cultural enrichment of other Jews like yourself and to give back to the same kind of community that has nurtured you and your Jewish identity.

"Our community is strengthened when organizations and schools can hire the best people available. UJA Federation is pleased to offer this free posting service and to make it readily accessible to Jews in the Greater Toronto Area and beyond," says Glennie Lindenberg, Chair, Community Engagement, UJA Federation.

Between January and August 2002, UJA Federation's Jeweish Information Service (JIS) received 150 calls and e-mails from people asking about job opportunities in Toronto, the majority of whom were looking for something in the Jewish community. One year later that number had climbed to 228 - an increase of 50%.

To search this new service, go to www.jewishtoronto.net and click the community jobs icon on the right side. For more information or to post a position, call Barbara Barak at Jewish Information Service, 416.631.5843.

All we truly have is each other

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Major General (Ret.) Giora Romm, the Director General of the Jewish Agency For Israel – UJA Federation's overseas partner - feels that the worldwide Jewish community today must stick together more than ever before, and that Israel's other "friends" cannot be relied upon.

"All we truly have is each other," said Romm. "We have Israel and we have Diaspora Jews, all the rest are conditional friends to us at best. At the end of the day, it's about whether or not we are successful. If so, they want to be our friends, if we're not, then they're not so interested. The only certain friends we have are each other and the worldwide Jewish community."

In Toronto recently to address a group of UJA Federation professionals and donors, Romm, who served for 33 years in the Israeli Air Force, was pessimistic about the peace process as long as Arafat is in charge of the Palestinian side.

"Arafat is a very unique phenomenon and he will never agree to any kind of solution in the Middle East, even one that gives him everything he wants. That would end his very own agenda and purpose. He doesn't want to wake up one day and have to deal with sewage problems in Hebron – that's not what Arafat is about."

Responding to questions concerning the state of aliyah today, Romm said that patterns of immigration are changing.

"While 800,000 new immigrants have made aliyah over the years, there is now a serious reduction in those figures," said Romm. "Since Russian President Putin has been in office, citizens are more positive about their future there. Also, to be honest, the situation in Israel is not quite as welcoming as it was between say 1992 and 2000."

"Klitah (absorption) into the Israeli culture and way of life works best if the new olim have friends or family already there," he said. "Otherwise it is much more complicated. Either way, the best way to ensure a positive absorption of a family is by us finding the head of the household – the mother or the father – a good job. It doesn't even have to be what he or she was doing back in their native Argentina, England or the former Soviet Union (FSU), but it must be something that gives him or her a place to go first thing each morning. It is not only a source of putting bread on the table, it is a source of pride and dignity, and it is essential to the entire social structure of Israel."

Germany has recently emerged as Israel's main source of immigration competition.

"In fact, as we speak, there is a strategic task force taking shape within The Jewish Agency looking at our present methods of aliyah. We are going to approach our whole philosophy of aliyah, looking at the package Germany is offering to families today that has made it such an attractive alternative for Jewish immigration."

Buy Israel...when you least expect it!

By Leonard Rosen, Managing Director, Lehman Brothers Investment Banking Unit

Leonard Rosen

I am head of our Israel business division, and Lehman Brothers has for a long time been the predominant investment bank in Israel. I am also a technology industry banker.

These days I am often asked about the Israeli economy. I should stress that I am not a research analyst. I am an investment banker, and I work with every Israeli company to some degree, so please treat everything I say that reflects on a company's merit in that context – in other words, not as unbiased. Also, I am not making any investment recommendations at all here.

That said, there has been a program going on advocating "buying Israeli"...buy Osem noodles or snacks, Tnuva cheese, Yarden or Carmel wines, Maccabee beer, Jaffa oranges. And that is great, and very important, but I think perhaps it doesn't go far enough, so let me tell you about a few more ways to buy Israeli.

Unexpected Israeli Purchases

- When you make a cell phone call, and the call doesn't go through, leave a voicemail. That's it. Or make calls just to leave voicemails. How is that buying Israeli? Because an Israeli company, Comverse Technology in Tel Aviv, is the world's largest producer of voice messaging systems worldwide. Or send text messages, or pictures, or send movie clips through your cell phones. OK, we can't do that yet, but they can in Korea, and Comverse's systems make that possible. Comverse earned over $700m in revenues last year from those products, and their stock is up almost 50% so far this year.
- Use more drugs. No, not what you're thinking. I mean prescription drugs. And when you do, have your doctor check the box that permits dispensing a generic version. Teva Pharmaceuticals of Petach Tikva is the world's largest manufacturer of generic pharmaceuticals. One out of every 16 prescriptions filled in the United States is for a Teva product made in Israel (or outside Israel but by Teva). And they earned over $2.7 billion in revenues last year, and their market cap, at $15 billion, is at an all-time high.
- Try to hack a computer system, and it is more than likely that the firewall that will keep you out is developed by Checkpoint of Ramat Gan. Spend too much time talking on the phone and you will touch on the products of Amdocs, the world's largest provider of complex billing systems software for communications service providers, market cap $5-1/4 billion, also of Ramat Gan.
- The next time you are stuck on the phone with customer service somewhere, and you get a message that says "to ensure proper service, this call is being recorded," remember that the two largest companies providing the systems that monitor those calls are Verint Systems of Tel Aviv and Long Island and NICE Systems of Ra'anana. If they hear your decibel level go up, or the call goes on too long, their software will detect that and shoot the call over to a manager the next morning to figure out what went wrong. So buy Israeli by yelling at a customer service rep.

Strengthening security

More on Verint: If you are a bad guy, and I know you're not, and you are communicating with other bad guys over your phone or cell phone or email, and the FBI figures out that it's your voice or that you've been talking about doing bad things, those are Verint's communications interception products at work. Its primary business is analytic software for homeland security. When they talk on the news about picking up chatter, they're talking about Verint's products. When you are walking through the airport and the cameras are following you, the software that determines whether there is something suspicious going on and alerts the guards to look at that camera is from Verint.

BUY ISRAELI

Buying Israeli

These companies and over 100 other Israeli companies are traded in the United States on Nasdaq or the NYSE, and in addition to buying Israeli, you can buy their stock.

Israel, as I am sure you have heard numerous times, has more companies traded in the U.S. than any foreign country except Canada.

Why is that?

Strengthening Israel

The most important reason for Israel's extraordinary economic development is not related to the government but to the country's people. Israel's population is the most highly educated in the world, with 135 engineers for every 10,000 people in the work force. In comparison, the U.S., which ranks second in this regard, has 70 per 10,000. In addition, the 800,000 new immigrants who arrived from the former Soviet Union contributed an enormously talented pool to the local work force.

These are what you buy when you buy Israeli. These "natural resources," Israel's people.

One more way to buy Israeli: watch a lot of TV. And get one of those cool flat panel display televisions. Because the leading company that makes the inspection equipment used to produce those displays is Orbotech, traded on Nasdaq, based in Yavne, Israel.

There is an old Midrashic story about how during the siege of Jerusalem, the emperor Vespasian told Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai that, at his request, he would save one thing, and Yochanan answered "Ten Li Yavneh V'Chachameha", give me Yavne and its wise men. And because of that the Jewish people were saved. Well, you can invest in these wise men of Yavne. And you can buy Israeli by watching the flat screen TVs that they help produce. And while you're at it, on your couch, snack on some Osem pretzels with Maccabee beer or Yarden wine.

The above is from an address given by Mr. Rosen this past summer in New York City.

To speak or not to speak: the intellectual's dilemma

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Prof. Martin Lockshin, the director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and an ordained Orthodox rabbi, is a dedicated supporter of Israel, but he feels like he's "walking on eggshells" when it comes to the topic of what Diaspora Jews should be saying publicly about Israel.

Lockshin discussed the issue recently at a York conference as part of a panel that included Rabbi Dow Marmur and Prof. Sara Horowitz. The panel, titled "Judaism, Israel and Public Advocacy: Spirit, Thought and the Body Politic," was part of a conference on "The Academic as Public Intellectual: Responsibility and the Public Sphere," in honour of philosophy professor Howard Adelman, the founder of York's Centre for Refugee Studies and a visiting fellow at Princeton University, on the occasion of his retirement from teaching.

Although Lockshin – who figures he has spent more than 20 per cent of his adult life living in Israel – believes that Israel behaves "in a much more moral manner" than many of its enemies, he said he finds some of the behaviour of the Israeli government to be wrong.

"As a community leader, do I criticize the Israeli government publicly, or not? It's a question I ask myself often."

Is it OK to publicly criticize Israel?

The case for standing up for what one believes to be moral behaviour is obvious, Lockshin said, but the case for holding one's peace in other instances is "more nuanced."

Israel, he said, is in danger and under attack, and needs international support. "Criticism in public leads to an erosion of such support and gives succor to Israel's enemies."

The case for silence in a just war is "fairly strong," he said, citing the rare public criticism by clergy of carpet bombing by the Allied troops during World War II.

Private criticism is another matter, he added. "That's a value I'm not willing to compromise, but serving as a moral gadfly when your people are suffering does not appear to me to be a morally attractive option."

Rabbi Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple, is also conflicted. "Like other members of minorities, my global view tends to be embarrassingly parochial, but I am a Jew rooted in tradition, so I also feel obliged to look at things from a universal moral perspective," he said. "I feel it's my responsibility as a creature of God to care for God's world and express it in whatever way I can."

He said he is "painfully conscious" that criticism "will be misused by the enemies of Israel.

"On the other hand, if I remain silent, am I true to what I stand for?" he asked.

He "escapes the agony," he said, by living for part of the year in Israel. As an Israeli citizen, Rabbi Marmur is comfortable speaking freely. "However vehemently anyone disagrees with me [in Israel], no one calls me an enemy of the Jewish community."

The rabbi said he is concerned about what he sees as a move "back into the ghetto a little bit when it comes to [Jewish] public policy.

"If that happens, I am alarmed," he said. "Then the whole effort of Jewish emancipation [of which Reform Judaism is a product, he said] is in danger. We fought to be equal to everyone else. If we now become constrained in what we're doing, I'm worried."

Horowitz, the associate director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said she also finds herself "in a bind" regarding what she speaks about and to whom.

"Lately I've been taken to wondering, when I speak critically of the Jewish community, who hears me and who overhears me. Societies need critique and correction… but do we then make ourselves easy targets?"

Words take on a life of their own "and go places where the speaker had not thought to venture," she cautioned. "More and more I find myself torn between speaking and not speaking."

Israeli merchants just a click away

For almost two years, consumers in the Diaspora have been purchasing products and services from Israeli merchants without even leaving their living room.

By clicking onto www.shopinisrael.com, a non-profit organization established to support Israeli businesses, artists, stores and manufacturers, they are connected to more than 400 merchants.

Jane Scher, who founded the Web site in February 2002 with 15 initial listings, said that since then, more then 430,000 consumers have visited.

In a message on the site, Scher said "life is tough in Israel at the moment, even more stressful than usual. Many of us living outside the country feel helpless witnessing the awful acts of terror that Israelis are forced to deal with on a daily basis.

"[What we can do to help] is visit Israel, and shop in Israel from anywhere in the world, even from our own homes. Imagine the potential impact of millions of people shopping through this site."

Included are shopping suggestions for various occasions, such as bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings, births, Mother's Day and all the Jewish holidays.

If you are searching for a particular artist, you can use the site's search function to find vendors who carry works by that artist. Shipping costs vary among vendors, and Scher said she welcomes new listings.

Different approaches to Halachah problematic: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The dean of the David Cardozo Academy for Jewish Studies and Human Dignity, Machon Ohr Aaron, in Jerusalem, says he is "disturbed" by the disparate approaches to Jewish law taken by different segments of Orthodox Jews.

"I must speak honestly," Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo said at a lecture sponsored by Torah in Motion and held at Beth Jacob v'Anshei Drildz Congregation. "I live in it [the Orthodox world]. I love it. But I have experienced sleepless nights about its future. Staying silent about it won't help anyone."

The modern Orthodox, Rabbi Cardozo said, have "a tendency to not give enough attention to halachic requirements. They may be too lenient in living up to its demands."

For the haredi, however, "exactly how much matzah one eats on Pesach becomes a major issue."

Although the two worlds overlap in many ways, and the distinctions are not absolute, the author and lecturer said each approach is problematic.

"Halachah is deeper, broader, than, for instance, American or Roman law. It affects our social, financial and private lives – the most private and intimate parts of life, and the most trivial," Rabbi Cardozo said.

The modern Orthodox community, he said, is more open to general society than the haredi community. It doesn't cut itself off from what the world has to offer – in fact, it is open to it.

The haredi, on the other hand, are more closed in, creating walls against outside influences, he said.

"It is the part of the Jewish people that survived the Holocaust. It has its own way of looking at things."

Both groups struggle with what Halachah is about, or, rather, he said, with what it should be.

For the haredi, Halachah "became the only way one expresses one's commitment to God. But there can be too much commitment to halachic detail without understanding the spirit, the music, the art behind it," Rabbi Cardozo said.

There is a danger that Halachah can become routine, merely external.

On the other hand, modern Orthodox Jews' commitment to Halachah is not always genuine, he said.

There is a certain "embarassment" about Halachah in modern Orthodox circles, he said. They do not see the beauty in halachic details and they ask what the purpose is of being so particular.

This has changed somewhat with the writings and teachings of such modern Orthodox leaders as the late Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, Rabbi Cardozo said.

"We must see the finger of God in everything, including what lies beyond the religious world," he said.

It appears there is no middle road, but one does exist, he said. It is more complex and difficult, but it is there.

"The whole halachic system has to fit into a search for an encounter with God, a search for kedushah, holiness. God said You will be holy because I am holy."

The fact that one always eats kosher and keeps Shabbat doesn't necessarily mean that one is holy, the rabbi said. "Something is missing. If one can't teach one's children to link kedushah with Halachah, we are losing out on the main point."

There has recently been an outpouring of halachic works on such subjects as family purity, Shabbat, how to find insects in food, tzniut and modesty.

"There is nothing wrong with that, But it is disturbing that few write about the deep meaning of living life according to the spirit of Halachah."

Living according to Halachah should lead to a more dignified, more holy way of life, he said. You should experience God in everything you do, feel and think.

The whole world, he said, is a religious experience – the seashore, a gentile doing a beautiful thing. "But you have to have eyes to see that."

The most trivial issue should be recognized as leading to an encounter with God. For instance, he said, normally we don't think about opening a refrigerator door – it's just something we do. On Shabbat, however, when there are many laws to consider, "we recognize that we live in God's world."

Halachah is not trying to teach us how to live our lives, he said.

"It transforms us so we can deal with the ineffable – it brings eternity to the trivialities of life."

ENTEBBE The Jonathan Netanyahu Story

A DEFINING MOMENT IN THE WAR ON TERRORISM

The remarkable account of the famous hostage rescue at Entebbe, and its commander, Jonathan Netanyahu. Learn how this modern-day Joshua inspired not only Israel but the whole free world through the success of this operation... described by many as a miraculous mission of biblical proportions.

"He seemed like a hero out of our ancient past."
Lead Pilot, Joshua Shani

July 4, 1976. The United States was celebrating 200 years of freedom and democracy. Thousands of miles away, freedom of a different kind was being celebrated as more than 100 hostages who had been held at gunpoint by terrorists in Entebbe, Uganda, were freed. The daring commander of this rescue mission was Jonathan (Yoni) Netanyahu; he was the only Israeli soldier killed in the Entebbe raid.

Visiting mispachah on the street with Ve'ahavta

By LAUREN KRUGEL
Special to The CJN

"What have I gotten myself into?" I ask myself as I rush into the headquarters of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, 20 minutes late.

It's just after 6 a.m. on a late-summer's day, and as I apologize and bemoan the TTC's early-morning service (or lack thereof), I meet Darryl Borden, Ve'ahavta's director of homeless initiatives for the first time. Obviously a morning person, he leads me out to the homeless outreach van that Irit and Narima, the two other, more punctual, volunteers have already stocked with coffee, sandwiches, clothing and toiletries. I rub my sore, heavy eyes and climb aboard.

Frank

The sun has barely peeked over the city's skyline, but here I am cruising around with Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless. Had this been a normal work day, I think to myself, I would still be in bed.

At first, I approach the experience as a journalist. I'm there to watch and ask questions. But it isn't more than 20 minutes after we set off that I realize this won't be just another story.

Our first "client" is Patrick, a soft-spoken man with salt-and-pepper hair and a kind smile. Darryl finds Patrick sauntering around his usual haunt in a midtown alleyway. He gives him a sandwich, a cup of coffee and a new tube of toothpaste.

Next, Darryl leaves the van to have a private conversation with Louis, who is wrapped in a bundle of blankets on some steps in Forest Hill. Narima, Irit and I wait in the van.

"There are homeless people in Forest Hill?" I wonder naively. It's an affluent area. Homeless people live in graffiti-etched, litter-strewn alleyways and bridges downtown. Not here. Not in my picture of the world.

Entering Nathan Phillips Square, we meet Frank and his 14 pet rats. The rats peek out of gym bags and pockets and Frank tells us their names, one by one. He arranges them on his arm, and a dangling row of thick tails reaches from his shoulder to his wrist. I'm amazed at how well-trained his pets are. He lets me take a photo. "Hurry up," he says. "My arm is getting tired."

Nathan Phillips Square is really the turning point for me. About 60 people emerge from underneath stairwells and benches. I put aside my notebook and tape recorder and decide to pitch in.

As I dig through the van to find a stick of deodorant for a client, a pretty teenage girl comes up to me and asks, "Are you Jewish?"

Taken aback, I say I am.

"I am too," she says quietly.

This girl should be at home in a comfortable house in Downsview or Thornhill, I think to myself. She should enjoy Friday night dinners with loving parents. She should go to school, get good grades, go out with her friends and prepare to go to university.

She should have my life. But she doesn't and that hurts.

Darryl takes me for a walk and asks me how I'm feeling. I tell him about the Jewish girl I met. "Did you get her name?" he asked.

"No," I reply.

I wish I had.

On the way out, we meet a frail-looking woman in a wheelchair. On her leg is a cast that's been scribbled on with vibrant magic marker. She says she needs a new pair of glasses.

Irit digs through a bag of discarded glasses and finds the perfect pair for her.

As she slips the glasses on, a smile spreads across her face as if to say, "Wow. So this is what the world looks like."

We head over to a downtown park, a popular spot for many street youth. Striker, a teenage girl with a cherub-like face and a safety pin through her eyebrow, approaches the van. She and Darryl speak excitedly for several minutes.

A few Ve'ahavta volunteers had taken her shopping recently for a new outfit, and Darryl tells her that she made quite an impression on them. This little, seemingly insignificant comment makes her eyes light up.

"She wanted to be treated like somebody's daughter," Darryl says later in the van.

The kids we find in the park say there's a girl who's in trouble. She's shivering and weak. Narima leaves the van and finds the young girl on a park bench and gives her her sweater to wrap around her shoulders.

Teens in the park.

When she comes back to the van, Narima says she thinks the girl on the bench is Jewish, because her name is Rivka. Narima gets her last name, and I know I know her from somewhere. I repeat her name in my head like a mantra. As I do, I realize it's the name of someone I went to high school with.

I never found out for certain if it was the same Rivka who was a few grades younger than me at our affluent suburban high school, but I have a gut feeling it was.

Girls from good Jewish homes in Thornhill don't run away. It happens to other people. Not us. That's the thought that stays in my mind as we ride on.

Later on, Darryl notes that he sees more Jewish kids on the street in the spring than any other time of year. It's because of the Passover seders, he says. Any family issues are magnified during the chaotic season. "It's a wonder we have two a year," he says.

Later, we find four kids living in tents under a bridge. A black Dobermann pinscher with a checkered bandana bounds toward us, barking. I'm afraid of dogs, especially big, barking ones in isolated areas. This is it, I think. I'm going to get mauled and die. No one will be able to find me. The dog approaches and licks me on the hand.

On the ground, we see a psychedelic picture painted in vibrant colours on a small rectangle of cardboard.

Physician stops noshing!

"I lost 5 pounds in the first week. It's been very easy and the weight loss has been steady. I stopped snacking after dinner. I felt guilty that I couldn't control my eating habits, even though, as a physician, I knew how it would affect my health. Now, with hypnosis, I find myself making better food choices.

With my career, as you can imagine, I experience a lot of stress. Hypnosis has helped me to cope much easier with situations at work.

I am more positive about life. I have no doubt these changes I'm making are permanent. It's not a diet; it's not just about losing weight. It's a lifestyle change. I've recommended Positive Changes to many others, whether it's for stopping smoking or losing weight because I know, first hand, that it works!"

Hashomer Hatzair gets new shlichah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shlomit Flexer applied to be a Toronto-based shlichah for Hashomer Hatzair about five years ago, but put the idea aside after learning that someone else had just been appointed.

Although she considered applying to other youth movements, because of her longstanding ties with Hashomer Hatzair she decided it would be that organization or nothing.

The Canadian-born ceramic artist and interior designer, who made aliyah with her family at age nine from Winnipeg, is now Toronto's new Hashomer Hatzair shlichah, thanks to a serendipitous dinner this summer with a family friend shortly before she was scheduled to return to Israel after a year in Toronto.

The friend, a board member and mother of three Hashomer Hatzair counsellors, had heard that the designated replacement for shlichah Ora Merin would not be coming here after all and, as Flexer put it, had a brainstorm.

Shlomit Flexer

If anyone was born to the position of youth group shlichah, it's Flexer. Her late mother, a native of Winnipeg, and her late father, an American, met in Israel after making aliyah with Habonim (now Habonim Dror), also a left-wing Zionist youth movement.

They were among the founders of Kibbutz Urim in the western Negev before Flexer was born, but moved back to Canada before returning to Israel, settling in Arad when Flexer was 10. "That's when I went to Hashomer Hatzair," she said. She spent four years as a counsellor with the movement when she was older.

After 35 years in Israel, Flexer decided to take a leave of absence from Kibbutz Revadim – a south Israel kibbutz affiliated with Hashomer Hatzair, where she has lived since 1978 – to spend time in Toronto, where her brother was married last summer.

Flexer, who has taught art to children and adults in Israel, said she "enjoys working with kids a lot." For her, working at Hashomer Hatzair is just "a different way of doing informal education."

The youth group in Toronto now has two chapters and runs a winter camp and summer camp, Camp Shomria. A second "ken" (chapter) was launched at the Bloor JCC in April to supplement the one in the northern part of the city, which serves almost 100 youngsters from age 7 to 18.

Although the Zionist organization is run by youth, Flexer said she may introduce some of her artistic knowledge and ideas into holiday decorating and other programs. She would also like to see more of an emphasis on environmental issues and activities, and is thinking of organizing an alumni group.

She would like to organize a group for counsellors and possibly for others their age who are not counsellors. In Israel, she said, she was involved in two groups as a counsellor: the younger children for whom she was responsible and her own peer group with whom she met regularly. "Here, they cease to be kids when they're counsellors. We didn't."

A graduate of the Bezalel Art Academy in Jerusalem, Flexer's whimsical and colourful pieces, including chanukiyot and custom-made tiles and sinks, have sold in Israel, New York and Holland. A more restrained creation is the clay headstone which marks her father's Toronto grave. On her kibbutz, she also did restoration and replicas for an onsite educational archeology museum.

Perhaps surprisingly, her small Toronto office has plain white walls and is unadorned by any of Flexer's art.

But Flexer is as pragmatic as she is artistic. "My main interest is to get things started and make the kids happy. Then I'll think about the office."

Life on the street with Ve'ahavta

"Who did this?" asks Darryl.

A young girl with black curly hair emerges from a tent and claims credit. Darryl asks if he can keep it and she says she doesn't see why not.

We've got to bring this girl more paint, I think to myself.

We meet three friends in a park-like setting by the lake. Rob, a spry older gentleman, tells us about their problems. The owners of the land have been threatening to sue them (I wonder for what) if they don't get off the property, and the police have been threatening to write them tickets for vagrancy. I wonder to myself why the police don't just leave them alone and go after real criminals.

We give some new clothes to Rachel, Rob's wife. She picks out a tailored forest green jacket and tries it on. She wants a mirror.

The closest thing we have is the shiny surface of the van. She admires herself in its murky reflection.

As we leave, she gives each of us a forceful, thankful hug.

As we head back to Ve'ahavta's office, I let it all sink in.

Darryl amazes me. He remembers the names, hobbies, interests and problems of hundreds of clients. He knows what books they like, who they hang around with. Each one of them is a close friend.

He pats them warmly on the back, shakes their hands, and listens patiently as they spill out whatever is on their mind, no matter how pressed for time he is.

"It's like visiting mishpachah," he says, and I think I'm beginning to understand what he means.

I always thought myself incapable of the patience and kindness it takes to do work like this. I thought I didn't have it in me. But by the end of the day, I realize that everyone has it in them.

Everyone is looking for something good to do. They just need to find a place to do it. I think I've found mine.

As Darryl says, "This is how you cure the cynics."

New children's book has Toronto connection

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

There's something familiar about the illustrations in Margie Blumberg's new children's book, Avram's Gift – and it's not just the detailed, warmly rendered shtetl depictions that bring the past to life for the story's modern-day protagonist.

While the pictures may strike a chord with Jews of eastern European origin, Torontonians – and members of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation in particular – are likely to recognize the north Toronto synagogue and its clergy, Rabbi Philip Scheim and Cantor Marshall Loomer, who served as models for illustrator Laurie McGaw.

Avram's Gift (MB Publishing, 2003) is the story of eight-year-old Mark, who fears the picture of his stern-faced, bearded great-great-grandfather that his mother wants to hang in their new house. On Rosh Hashanah, over lunch, his Grandpa Morris helps him see his ancestor in a new light, through detailed and affectionate childhood recollections.

And in a plot thread that's particularly appropriate at this time of year, Mark aspires to learn to blow the shofar that is a hallmark of High Holy Day services. The threads are all woven together by the end of the story, which is followed by an afterword that includes information on shofar-blowing and ideas for exploring one's own family roots.

Although Avram's Gift is fictional, it was sparked by a true story about the author's real-life great-great-grandfather Avram Hirschman, whose portrait hangs in her parents' Chevy Chase, Md., home.

On Rosh Hashanah six years ago, Blumberg heard about her great-great-grandfather from her great-uncle Morris, then aged 94, who, like the fictional Grandpa Morris in her book, left the shtetl of Aroshka as a child, saying good-bye to his grandfather Avram Hirschman at the train station.

"He took the frame in his hands and brought the photograph very close to his face," Blumberg recalled in a phone interview from her home in Bethesda, Md. "He said if you were to look up the word 'love' in the dictionary, you would find his grandpa's picture there.

"We were all in tears," she said. "He hadn't seen [Avram] in 88 years."

The next day, Blumberg came up with the idea of a book – as if a light bulb had gone off, she explained – and she subsequently interviewed her great-uncle more extensively.

A lawyer by training, Blumberg wrote and published a desk calendar with cartoons and recipes, Is There Life After Chocolate? and co-authored Shakespeare for Kids: His Life and Times. She is working on a third book, about grammar, for age 12 and up, and is reading manuscripts for MB Publishing, the company she established earlier this year.

"I was always read to as a child," she said, and she has always wanted to write books. Renowned author Leon Uris, who died this summer, was a first cousin to her father. Although they lived in different cities, once Blumberg started writing, they began to be in contact and were starting to get to know each other better when he became ill.

Blumberg's brother Mark, a professor at the University of Iowa, has also written a book recently. Body Heat (Harvard University Press) discusses temperature and life on earth for the lay reader, she said.

Finding the right illustrator for Avram's Gift involved poring over "hundreds and hundreds" of books. When Blumberg saw McGaw's illustrations in Polar the Titanic Bear, she knew her search had ended.

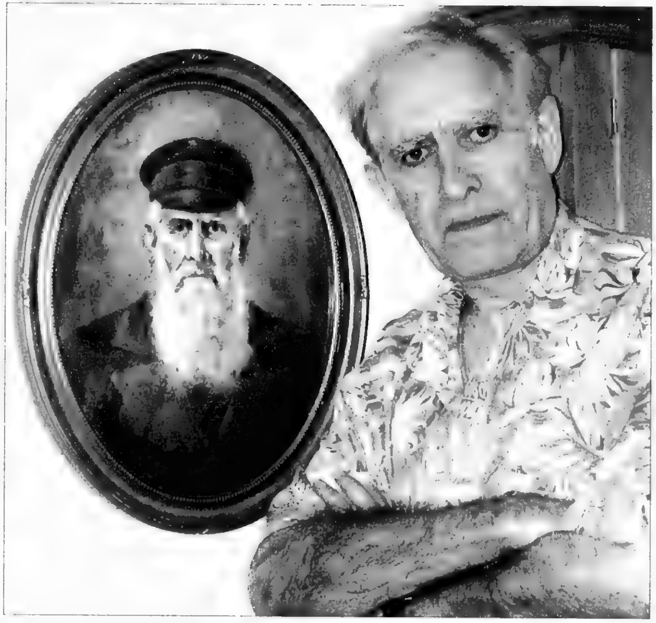
The award-winning artist, based in Shelburne, Ont., used real-life models for the characters in the book, fleshing out the shtetl scenes with details borrowed from historical photographs.

She came to Beth David through Linda Kabot, the model for Mark's grandmother and a Beth David member. Kabot became friendly with McGaw after learning about her own family history in the children's book, Journey to Ellis Island, written by Carol Bierman, a relative of Kabot's whom she'd never met, and illustrated by McGaw.

Cubby Marcus, a clean-shaven, personable 68-year-old, was the model for the forbidding Avram. (McGaw added the beard when she did the illustrations.) Although he doesn't look the part at first glance, he was very taken with the scenes for which he was asked to pose.

"There's a magical transcendence that goes on between grandchildren and grandparents," he said at the book launch this summer. "It's something that transcends time."



Cubby Marcus, the model for a young boy's ancestor in the book Avram's Gift, poses beside the portrait that plays a key role in the story. [Frances Kraft photo]

Our Jewish Schools Need Leaders!

OPERATION JEWISH EDUCATION
IT IS OUR RESPONSIBILITY

THANK YOU!

Jews for Judaism and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, wish to express our profound gratitude to the dozens of dedicated volunteers who helped thwart the recent Jews for Jesus crusade in Toronto. We appreciate the hundreds of concerned Jews who called the Jews for Judaism Hotline alerting us to the location of missionaries on Toronto streets. Those important tips enabled our volunteers to arrive on the scene, counter-leaflet and frustrate the missionaries during their entire three-week crusade. Thanks as well, to those who helped distribute over 100,000 educational booklets throughout the city and to those who went to each of the missionary film presentations, alerting potential attendees to the real agenda of the program. Yasher Koach!!

Wishing the Jewish community of Toronto

Missionary's talk sparks debate on Mideast

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

A speech last week by a Christian missionary ignited the latest clash between Arab students and their pro-Israel counterparts at York University.

Seventy-five people attended the talk by Canadian Bruce Balfour, who was invited to York by the Young Zionist Partnership to speak about his recent experiences in Lebanon, where he was imprisoned for allegedly spying for Israel.

Peppering his speech with biblical quotations, Balfour spoke of his quest to replant the cedars of Lebanon as described in the biblical book of Jeremiah.

He said he travelled in and out of Lebanon many times over the course of a number of years, meeting with Lebanese authorities and fundraising to replant the cedars, which, though once plentiful, now only number 17 patches.

Balfour arrived in Beirut on July 10 and was immediately detained by police.

"I kept thinking they were going to question me and then let me go," he said. Instead, Balfour was taken to prison where he was barred from contacting the Canadian embassy and was charged with spying for Israel.

"There's no Israeli stamp in my passport whatsoever," said Balfour, showing the passport to the assembled students. Balfour had previously visited Israel as part of his work with his medical and relief missionary group.

In prison, conditions were hot and cramped, he said, but though he was questioned for hours on end, he was never beaten.

"I was roughed up a few times, but they never beat me," Balfour said.

He said his trial was delayed numerous times by Lebanese authorities. His luggage was also seized and his religious materials were brought before the court to implicate him. He said he was forced to debate the Bible for hours during the trial.

"Probably the best Bible studies I ever had were with these prosecutors in Lebanon," he joked.

Vows never to return to Lebanon

Balfour was convicted of "teaching dangerous ideas" and deported from Lebanon after a 55-day imprisonment. Though he once professed a deep love for Lebanon, which he calls "God's land," he has since vowed he will never return.

Balfour said he is astounded that a man as apolitical as he is was accused of being a threat.

"I was not there to disturb anybody," he said. "I love the Muslims, Christians, Israelis, and Palestinians all the same."

After his speech, Balfour was challenged by students in attendance, who accused Israel of practising the same kind of discrimination against Arab students.

Ali Hassan, president of the Middle Eastern Students Association at York said that "the judicial systems of the Middle East are no secret," and that Balfour was held as a result of his own "false judgement".

"If I went to Israel, I might be held simply on the suspicion of my own Arab name," Hassan charged.

Political science student Rabia Siddiqui came to Hassan's defence, charging that she had attempted to visit Israel and was turned away.

"I was interrogated for five hours," she alleged. "They told me that I caused a threat to Israel."

Many students attempted to rebut the allegations. Philosophy student Adena Phillips said later that many Jewish students were offended by the remarks by Hassan and Siddiqui.

Phillips said she sympathized with Siddiqui, but didn't think her experience was common.

"Of course that happens from time to time," Phillips said. "But the difference is that in Israel, they consider it a tragedy. In Lebanon, this is the law."

The Balfour event follows other Mideast-related incidents at York last winter.

In one, controversial pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes, who runs a U.S.-based Web site that monitors professors and universities for their approaches to Mideast studies, delivered a speech on campus under heavy security. It was preceded and followed by protests against his appearance, which was sponsored by York's Jewish Student Federation and Hillel.

In a subsequent incident, a woman protesting the looming war in Iraq was charged with assault after a Jewish student said the protester grabbed and kicked her during the demonstration.

YZP chief of operations Yaakov Roth said Balfour's speech was part of the campus group's ongoing agenda to educate people about the realities of the Middle East.

"I don't think the debate was really significant," said Roth, explaining that the YZP expects a hostile reaction any time it runs a program.

"We believe that the conflicts in the Middle East have to be put in a broad perspective," he said. "You have to examine the region as a whole."

Jewish organizations condemn hijab-related expulsion

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Local Jewish organizations joined the outcry last week over news that a student was expelled from a private French-language high school for wearing the hijab, the head scarf worn by Muslim females.

"It is scandalous," Joseph Gabay, president of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region (CJC-Q), said of the Sept. 2 expulsion. "This is totally opposite to the ideals of tolerance and openness that a school is supposed to impress on its students."

> 'This is totally opposite to the ideals of tolerance and openness that a school is supposed to impress on its students'

"We would expect that a full investigation would take place, and that disciplinary action be taken against those who have committed this offence," said Stephen Scheinberg, national chair of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

The two Jewish organizations were among others that have condemned the Collège Charlemagne in West Island Pierrefonds for expelling 16-year-old Irène Wassem, who refused to remove her hijab when asked. The school said the head scarf violated the school's dress code allowing only uniforms and nothing on the head.

The Muslim Council of Montreal and the Quebec Human Rights Commission (QMHC) have also criticized the expulsion, with the commission agreeing to investigate it.

The school, whose slogan is "Open to the World," has so far refused to comment on the issue. But late last week, Julie Baudet, administrative assistant to the school's principal, Bernard Laudy, told The CJN the school would be issuing a release clarifying its position "in a few days."

In 1995, the QMHC ruled that public school dress codes banning the hijab violated the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but it has not ruled on such bans at private schools.

For Gabay, whether the school's decision was legal or not was secondary.

"Look, we are in the human rights business, so this issue is a no-brainer," Gabay said. "From a purely moral point of view, this decision should have been reversed yesterday."

According to a report on CBC News Online, a representative of the United Muslim Students Association said that the Collège Charlemagne had also barred Jewish students from wearing kippot.

Gabay said that if such a ban really happened, it is incumbent on the students to speak up for their rights and/or contact CJC-Q.

Gabay called it a completely "fallacious argument" to defend the hijab ban on the principle of preserving uniformity of dress among the students.

"In my mind, one of the hallmarks of the dress code's uniformity is that freedom of thought still exists despite it. So in a way, banning the hijab, which is freedom of religious thought, goes against the very principles of a dress code."

Steve Slimovitch, a lawyer and senior counsel for B'nai Brith's league, said the expulsion is a "clear violation of Ms. Wassem's right to practise her religion freely."

Since her expulsion, Wassem has been attending the English-language Riverdale School.

Ottawa artist creates Jewish puppets

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Artist Aranyani Rosen, who has worked in a variety of media throughout her career, has a new venture: Jewish puppetry.

Originally from Toronto, Rosen has been in Ottawa for nearly a decade. Her extensive artistic experience includes work as an illustrator in both publishing and television. She has worked as a storyboarder for TVO, Hanna Barbera and the BBC, creating her own characters as well as the accompanying script material and music for a variety of shows.

Her recent interest in Jewish themes has taken her work in a new direction. On the 50th anniversary of Israel's independence, Rosen presented a pencil drawing called The Call of the Shofar to David Sultan, the former Israeli ambassador to Canada.

Rosen, who is currently making large pencil drawings of several panels, is used to large-scale work. One of her pieces was on display at Beth Sholom Synagogue during the Yom Yerushalayim concert there in 2000.

Rosen has also incorporated Jewish themes into her research on paper cuts. The artist, who has taught a course on Judaic paper cuts at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC), says it is a lost art.

"This form of artwork was mostly lost during the Holocaust and there has been a resurgence," Rosen says.

"I want to restore it and bring it to the city of Ottawa."

That was also her motivation behind her puppetry.

"I decided to make some puppets with a Jewish theme as this art was largely lost during the Holocaust as well," she says.

Rosen, who is a member of the Ontario Puppetry Association, says, "I decided to make 'Muppet-quality' puppets for theatre and television."

She's calling on Jewish artists, singers and storytellers to help her promote "our rich cultural heritage."

Rosen, who is currently recruiting members for her newly created Judaic Puppet Guild, hopes that both amateurs and professionals will be able to work together on a puppet theatre that will showcase Jewish themes to the wider public.

Rosen also hopes to take her puppet skits to local Jewish schools, synagogues and the Jewish Community Centre, and she has plans to teach children and students how to make giant puppets for a Purim parade and puppet show.

Non-Jews celebrate Rosh Hashanah in Sask.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — It's erev Rosh Hashanah and a crowd of 52 people has gathered to celebrate the Jewish New Year. The tablecloths are white and bathed in candlelight and the food is traditional: round challot, gefilte fish, chicken soup and matzah balls, tzimmes and a honey cake.

It might sound like most Jewish households in Canada, but this is an unusual scene. This is Esterhazy, Sask., where a crowd of non-Jews will gather Friday night in Margie's Corner, a restaurant attached to a gas station owned by 66-year-old Marjorie Toth.

"I want to do Rosh Hashanah in appreciation of the Jewish people that contributed so much to the development of the West," said Toth, who is an observant Lutheran. "The world is all backwards, and in my own small way, I'm trying to promote love and understanding between people of different cultures and religions."

A Swede by descent, Toth learned about Judaism as a teenager, when she worked at Harry's General Store, a shop owned by Harry Markovitch, one of the town's two Jewish families. It was 1954, a time when virtually every town in the prairies had a Jewish merchant or shopkeeper, people who played a vital role in the development of the West. Helping out in the kitchen on the holidays and assisting in the Markovitch family's bar mitzvah celebrations, Toth developed a lifelong appreciation for the Jewish people, their culture and food. Today, she remembers Harry Markovitch as "the best boss I ever had."

She's not alone in her memories. Of the 50 locals who each paid $10 for the homemade Rosh Hashanah dinner, many of them knew the town's Jewish families. This year, they learned about the Jewish traditions associated with the New Year, as Toth explained the significance of the holiday and the traditional food.

"A lot of people don't know any of the Jewish customs at all," Toth said, adding that she hoped to give them "a little education as well."

To make sure she had the menu right, Toth called Markovitch's daughter, Karen Trester, who now lives in Vancouver.

"She wanted to find out what prayers she should say over the candles, and told me my parents were so wonderful that she developed a love of the Jewish people from them," said Trester. "With all the hatred going on in the world with anti-Semitism, I told her it's friends like her that Jews need."

Rosh Hashanah isn't the only holiday that's been celebrated in Margie's Corner, which Toth and her husband purchased three years ago. Last Christmas Eve, she hosted a Ukrainian dinner, and in July, she organized a celebration of First Nations.

While business at her gas station on the corner of highways 9 and 22 in Esterhazy is going slowly, the special events Toth prepares in her restaurant are well-attended.

"I don't like to brag, but the food is very good," she said. "We make everything ourselves. The only thing that's bought is the ketchup."

Former Winnipegger launching two new books

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For years, Rabbi Neal and Carol Rose and their family have conducted their own alternative High Holy Day services in Winnipeg.

This year, however, there will be one less family member involved.

Their youngest son, Or will be officially launching two new books God in All Moments, a collection of chassidic wisdom; and Abraham Joshua Heschel: Man of Spirit, Man of Action, a biography of the 20th century rabbi and social activist, written for children ages 9 to 12.

As well, he has been invited to join the teaching staff of the Hebrew College of Boston in its newly opened rabbinical school.

Rose, who left Winnipeg in 1991 to study at Yeshiva University in New York, is currently working on his doctoral thesis at Brandeis University. His area of study is Jewish thought with a focus on Jewish mysticism and theology.

"As a graduate student, I am required to write regularly," he says.

He chose to write a biography of Heschel for children after realizing that at the Abraham Joshua Heschel School in New York where he has been teaching for the last two years, most of the students and many of the staff knew nothing about him.

"There is a large picture of him at the front of the school, and when I asked students who the man in the picture was, most thought he was Albert Einstein."

Rose says that Heschel's life story actually unfolded in a story-book fashion. He was born to a chassidic dynasty in Warsaw, studied at a Zionist institute in pre-war Berlin, came to the United States on a scholar's visa to escape the Nazis, and became a leader in the civil rights movement.

"His religious writings dealt with themes which, when simplified, speak with a spiritual sensitivity that children understand – concepts such as gratitude and life renewal, radical amazement, and experiencing God's presence in nature and in the presence of friends and family," Rose says.

He says he has read excerpts from the 70-page book – published by the Jewish Publication Society – in a few schools in New York and Boston as well as at the annual Cage Conference on Jewish Education in August. The official launch is coming up in November.

The other book, God in All Moments, is a compilation of little-known chassidic texts, including words of wisdom for dealing with everyday situations.

Rose translated the writings into English, and wrote an introduction and commentaries on the writings .He collected words of advice from 70 rabbis and sages.

The book, published by Jewish Life, is scheduled to be launched this month.

Guardian editorial on Iran distorted

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Every once in a while an editorial appears in a major publication that is so brazen in its obtuseness as to demand our attention. A case in point is "Iran's fears are real," the Sept. 16 lead editorial in Britain's influential Guardian newspaper.

First, some background. On Sept. 12, in Vienna, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) voiced its alarm about Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program by giving Tehran an Oct. 31 deadline to disclose its nuclear activities. Iranian diplomats stormed out of the meeting and Iran, instead of answering the charges, threatened to quit the IAEA and even to withdraw from the nuclear non-proliferation treaty itself.

According to a Sept. 13 news report in the Guardian, Canada was one of the co-authors of the IAEA resolution (along with Australia and Japan) "asking Iran to suspend all uranium enrichment activities, agree to snap UN inspections, and… provide copious information to the inspectors by the end of October."

Should Iran fail to comply with the terms of the resolution, it would be declared in breach of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and would, as the report put it, "join North Korea as an international pariah deemed to be building a nuclear bomb."

What began long ago as a largely American (and Israeli) concern with Iran's nuclear ambitions has become a solidly international affair. Britain, whose Tehran embassy has been shot at repeatedly, and other European states are now expressing concern about Iran's nuclear bomb-making efforts.

Whereas evidence of Iraq's suspected nuclear weapons program has still not been uncovered, evidence of Iran's program is irrefutable and mounting.

Nuclear bombs can be made with either uranium or plutonium. The IAEA recently found traces of weapons-grade uranium at a nuclear facility near the town of Natanz, which is a clear violation of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. And last February, the agency found facilities at Natanz capable of producing enough weapons grade uranium to produce at least two nuclear bombs by 2005. As well, Iran mines its own uranium in the Yazd area, about 1,000 kilometres southeast of Tehran, and it has secretly developed a heavy water plant to produce plutonium near the town of Arak. Iran failed to disclose the Natanz and Arak sites. Information about them came from an Iranian dissident group.

Iran has nuclear weapons program

What's more, with the help of North Korea, Iran has developed a series of Shahab missiles that can deliver non-conventional weapons to Israel and well beyond.

Iran's fundamentalist Shi'ite leaders, especially the heads of the dominant Revolutionary Council, are fanatical in their denunciation of the United States and Israel, boasting of their determination to destroy the Jewish state.

The regime has reportedly given refuge to Al Qaeda terrorists who fled Afghanistan and was behind the Karine-A heavy arms shipment to the Palestinian Authority in January 2002. It also funds Hamas and is the major force behind Hezbollah, described recently in a chilling New Yorker profile as the world's most dangerous terrorist organization.

Despite all these facts, including the international alarm over Iran's nuclear program (which was under-reported in the Canadian media), the Guardian editorial astonishingly argued that Iran needs atomic weapons as a defence against the threat of "a hostile nuclear-armed Israel."

The Guardian also totally whitewashed Iran's horrific record of political and human rights violations. What the Guardian did say is that "Iran remains a devoutly observant Islamic republic" whose clerics "have no interest in promoting Al Qaeda type of Sunni fundamentalism," or in supporting international terrorism.

Everything the Guardian editorial said is not only counterfactual, it's absurd – a breathtaking example of distortion, whitewashing and omission of details – as revealed in the paper's own news reports. Remarkable.

Sutton Group Admiral's sales force continues spectacular growth

In the past two years, this "little company that grew" has seen its sales force swell by more than 40%, to over 140 salespeople and counting! Now in its 11th year, the firm continues to be a magnet for top agents looking to increase their bottom line. With maximum opportunity and minimum hassle, it's not hard to see why.

Murray Goldkind

Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing these prospective new team members.

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

"Fee for services" concept

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

"I was only temporarily shocked to hear that this is the position of the Canadian government. After reflecting somewhat on Canada's voting record at the United Nations on motions against the State of Israel, I realized this was in keeping with their platform. My support for a Liberal government has been thrown into question once again as will my vote in the next federal election," Tannenbaum wrote.

Doiron said "the government's view is that the future status of the city must be agreed on by the parties directly concerned. Once this has been done, the question of birth notations in Canadian passports with respect to Jerusalem will be reviewed in light of the agreement reached."

In the United States, meanwhile, the State Department follows a similar passport policy regarding Jerusalem.

Last month, the Jerusalem Post reported, an American-Israeli couple filed a lawsuit against U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, claiming U.S. law requires the State Department to enter their son's place of birth as "Jerusalem, Israel."

The suit alleges that when Naomi Siegman Zivotofsky asked the U.S. embassy in Tel Aviv to enter her son's place of birth as "Jerusalem, Israel," she was told that would be contrary to U.S. law.

An issue brief prepared for Congress by the Congressional Research Service and the Library of Congress notes the Senate and House of Representatives passed a policy statement in 1995 that included language that allowed persons born in Jerusalem to name Israel as their birthplace in U.S. passports.

"On Sept. 30, 2002, President George W. Bush said the Jerusalem provisions were advisory only, a position at odds with many in Congress who believed the provisions were binding," the brief stated.

Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said Canada has consistently refused to recognize Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem, "primarily because UN calls for the international status of Jerusalem pre-empted claims of sovereignty.

"Our position is different, that Jerusalem is the capital of the Jewish state and has served as the capital of no other state for 3,000 years and Canadian policy is misguided."

The CIC, the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, raises the issue of Jerusalem as the No. 1 item on its agenda when it meets with Ottawa lawmakers, Fogel said.

The Canadian government, he continued, should consider Jerusalem Israel's capital."Whatever else happens in the peace process, Israel will always have Jerusalem as its capital. It may share sovereignty, divide Jerusalem differently, but it is incontrovertible that our attachment to Jerusalem will not be compromised and I think it's time for Canada to recognize that."

Ronen Gil-Or, deputy head of mission at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa, said "we believe Jerusalem is part of Israel and, according to Israeli law, the capital of Israel. So there is no basis to differentiate between the two places, Israel and Jerusalem."

Balfour likely a pawn in Syrian game

dream to reforest the cedar groves in northern Lebanon. When he arrived in Beirut – sporting a new Canadian passport that did not bear an Israeli stamp – he was taken aside quickly and jailed.

He said he later learned "I had already been convicted" in absentia at an April 2 trial on the collaboration charge. Balfour, 52, was placed in an immigration jail cell that measured three metres by four metres and which at times held 35 men. He was later transferred to the Rouhmi prison.

Lebanese authorities at first refused to contact Canadian diplomats, but Balfour said he managed to sneak a message out of prison with a member of a humanitarian organization. The Lebanese government then lied to Canadian authorities, denying he was in jail. Finally, on July 24, he had his first visit from a Canadian envoy.

Bejjani said nothing in Lebanon happens without Syrian connivance. Their plan to use Balfour as a bargaining chip fell through because of the publicity and because the Canadian government likely concluded a deal with other Lebanese power-brokers, he said.

As for the future, Balfour is urging the Canadian government to consider attaching strings to a $250 million aid package earmarked for Lebanon. Canada should insist the money is properly accounted for or should give it directly to aid agencies and individual Lebanese organizations rather than to the government, he said.

The Legend of Unetaneh Tokef

By CHARLES HELLER

The High Holy Days prayer Unetaneh Tokef is as famous for its legendary origin as for its stirring text: "The great shofar is sounded… Behold Yom Hadin – the Day of Judgement… On Rosh Hashanah it is written and on Yom Kippur it is sealed… who will live and who will die."

This is the legend: A certain Rabbi Amnon of Mainz, in the 11th century, was asked to convert to Christianity. He hesitated before replying, but then regretted that he did not refuse outright, and begged to be tortured as punishment. Dying of his wounds, he was carried into the synagogue, where he improvised the Unetaneh Tokef. After his death, he appeared in a dream to the great poet Kalonymus ben Meshullam, who wrote the whole prayer down.

Unfortunately, there are two things wrong here. First of all, this story was not recorded until the 13th century. Why did it take 200 years to be written down? Second, there is no other record of the existence of this Rabbi Amnon. So is it indeed just a legend?

Legends do not appear out of the blue. Something must have actually happened during those terrible times of martyrdom to turn this into legend.

Here's my theory: The key to this story is that the Unetaneh Tokef text is based on ancient sources dating back to the time of the Mishnah. The Talmud mentions how we pass before God like sheep, and our deeds are written in a book. (The sounding of the shofar on the Day of Judgement – that is, Rosh Hashanah – dates back to a command in the Torah itself.) Our Unetaneh Tokef text was already established by the eighth century, which is the date of a fragment found in the Cairo Genizah that matches Rabbi Kalonymus' text.

The story gets more interesting when we look at some lines of a hymn about Judgement Day written by a Jewish convert to Christianity named Romanos, who lived in the sixth century: "Everything trembles… the books are opened… the angels cry out… the trumpet sounds… God saves like a shepherd."

Through this hymn, the dramatic vision of the Day of Judgement entered Christian liturgy. (Note that our annual Day of Judgement has turned into an apocalyptic event at the end of time.)

Fast forward to the 13th century, where we meet Thomas of Celano, one of the first Franciscan monks. His most famous poem is Dies Irae, "Day of Wrath," which is now part of the requiem mass for the dead. It includes the following lines: "What trembling there will be… the book is brought out… the trumpet spreads its wondrous sound… grant me a place among the sheep." We can see immediately how these vivid images are derived from Jewish tradition.

My personal theory about the "Rabbi Amnon" legend is this: Sometime in the 13th century, a Christian scholar writing about the Day of Judgement, maybe even Thomas of Celano himself, persuaded a rabbi to help him with the sources. Afterward, the rabbi was filled with remorse over collaborating with the church at that terrible time, just like Rabbi Amnon, but the twist is that what he felt remorse over was teaching the Unetaneh Tokef prayer itself.

Many readers of The CJN will be familiar with the Dies Irae in the requiems of Mozart and Verdi. There is a particularly stirring setting by Benjamin Britten in his War Requiem, which combines the Dies Irae with the moving words of Wilfred Owen, the poet of World War I: "Bugles sang, saddening the evening air…"

Charles Heller is choir director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Reflections on the Day of Atonement

By DAVID SCHATZKY

Every year as Yom Kippur approaches, I'm reminded of an error I made as a child, when I thought that the Day of Atonement was the day of "at-one-ment." Half a century later, I now believe atonement and "at-one-ment" are the same thing. How can that be?

To be at one with oneself means accepting who we are in every way: our strengths, weaknesses, desires, achievements, mistakes, failures, frailties and misdemeanours. Yom Kippur is the ideal time to reflect on the totality of our being, to embrace every aspect of ourselves: the good, the bad and the ugly.

It is actually good for the soul – as painful as it may be to get there – to dig deep and question our motives, our goals, our thoughts and our actions – not for the sake of beating ourselves up or falsely humbling ourselves, but to see ourselves clearly, totally, for who we are. It is liberating to drop illusions about ourselves, to be free of self-deception. Yom Kippur is the time when the truth can really set us free.

Unhappiness among top sins of new century

This has nothing to do with confessing sins. Errors of judgement, bad timing, insensitivity towards others and not living up to our own standards all carry their own consequences or punishment. We don't need anyone or anything else to chasten us, when we know, deep down, that we aren't behaving in our own – or other people's – best interests.

Hillel's famous "If I'm not for myself, who will be for me? If I am for myself alone, what am I? If not now, when?" serves as a wonderful guide to assessing our "at-oneness." If we consistently achieve a balance among self-interest, altruism and timing, we can celebrate the Day of Atonement with a degree of well-earned satisfaction.

If, on the other hand, we fall short of Hillel's ideal – and who doesn't – we can examine what it is about us that has brought us to this very human state of imperfection. We can attempt to discover what we need to do to transform our profound imperfections into not quite so profound imperfections.

Atoning can be thought of as attuning ourselves to our best self, and dedicating ourselves to being kinder, gentler, more reliable, open, honest, clear, effective and happy.

Yes, happy. On a list of the sins of the 21st century, unhappiness would be at the head. As Samuel Beckett wrote, "There's nothing funnier than unhappiness." Unhappiness is the failure to accept the ultimate irony of life. We are born to die and condemned to make the best of life in the meantime. This provides lots of opportunity to enjoy the blessings of life, despite the fact – as Ludwig Wittgenstein so pointedly reminds us – "The world is independent of our will." Accepting that liberates us from any illusion that life is easy, predictable, controllable or will go the way we want it to. So we might as well enjoy.

Among other sins-of-our-time that we can recognize on Yom Kippur is under-stimulation. Too often, we're bored or feel empty because we're not doing enough for our minds, bodies, friends, neighbours, communities and the world. We sit like lumps contemplating the unfairness of it all rather than plunging into life and service to others.

Over-stimulation is another sin. We become so dependent on business, duty, obligation, obsessions with beauty, lust, virtue or cleanliness that we can't let go. We ignore the words or feelings of those close to us. That's destructive indeed. On Yom Kippur, reflecting on whether we have lost ourselves and lost contact with others because of our addiction to something else is a worthy and rewarding task.

How will my own atonement or "at-one-ment" proceed this year? I'll work at recognizing my full-frontal avoidance of some lifelong demons that have prevented me from standing on my own two feet. And that has gotten in the way of sustaining intimate relationships that have I deeply craved. I will acknowledge to myself how competitive I am. And how much I've avoided discipline and rigour, to my detriment.

What will you accept about yourself, and then try to change, so that you too this Yom Kippur will be at one with yourself?

Atonement. At-one-ment. They are the same thing.

באזל-רומא-ירושלים 2003

עבודתי הביאה אותי החודש לבאזל. חשבתי לעצמי- עיר שוויצרית משעממת- לפחות אלך לבקר את המקום שבו הכריז הרצל על מדינת היהודים. המרפסת המפורסמת במלון שלושת המלכים שבה הצטלם הרצל, עדיין צופה על הריין, בדיוק, על היום, מאה וחמש שנים אחרי הקונגרס הציוני הראשון. את האג'נדה של הקונגרס מצאתי בְּמוזיאון היהודי המקומי והיא כתובה בגרמנית, שהיתה השפה הרשמית של הקונגרס. הקונגרס עצמו התקיים בְּאולם שעדיין עומד על תילו, והיום מְשַׁמֵּש כקאזינו, לא פחות ולא יותר, ואינך יכול שלא לחשוב על ההימור שלקח על עצמו הרצל.

אבי לֵב הוא עורך סרטים בכיר ב-סי.בי.סי, אבל אחרי שְׁעות העבודה הוא עוסק בְּחובי שלו-עשיית סרטים. לאחרונה ראיתי סרט חדש שלו שעושה טעם של עוד ומעורר משאלה שאולי היה כדאי שייקח את החובי שלו יותר ברצינות. בסרט "We are Samba" אבי מביא את סיפורה של להקת "בָּטֶרִיָה" מטורונטו, שעוסקת בסמבה. רוב חברי הלהקה אינם מבראזיל, אבל מאוד מאוד ברור שהלהקה הזו נותנת להם את טעם החיים. אבי מלווה קומץ מחברי הלהקה- עורכת דין, נער שליחויות, צייר, נהג רכבת תחתית, ולכולם שינתה הלהקה את החיים.

יש לאבי עין מדהימה לראות פרטים ולגעת באנשים דרך המצלמה. אין לי ספק שזה שהוא בעצמו בא מארץ קטנה בסוף העולם גורם לו להיות רגיש ולראות את השונה והמשותף בְּדרך שקנדי רגיל אולי לא יכול לראות. מבריק. אני מקווה שהסרט יגיע למסכים במהרה, ואם לא- נצטרך לעשות משהו בעניין.

שנה טובה

עוד שנה עברה. שיהיה לכם את כל מה שאתם מייחלים, ובעיקר בריאות ושלוות נפש. ושישראל תתחיל לראות קְצה של תקוות אחרי שנה כל כך איומה. ואם לצטט את שמעון זר אביב בְּמשפט שאהוב עליי: תשמרו על עצמכם, ותשמרו אחד על השני.

Symbolic foods to break the fast

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

In our family, the break-the-fast dinner of Yom Kippur is the most anticipated meal of the year. Of course, one reason for the expectation is that we've just spent the last 25 hours fasting.

The other is that as soon as the sun goes down and the shofar is blown for the last time, it's only a matter of minutes before we can feast upon my mama and grandma's delicacies – fresh challah, gefilte fish, pickled herring in sour cream, kugels, zimsterne cookies and persimmon pudding, plus special fish, fruits and vegetables cooked into dishes because they symbolize good luck, happiness and abundance in the coming year.

The two matriarchs love planning and serving this colourful meal. And the children love teasing about what each dish symbolizes, then giggling hysterically when they're told grandpa is served a fish's head because he's the head of the family.

One of the true miracles of this holiday is that mama and grandma, even though they've been sitting in synagogue all day with the rest of us, are bustling about the kitchen when we get home. Dazzling smells waft through the house, and special drinks wait on the table to quench our thirst. Although we are exuberant, our mouths are parched and our bodies weak.

Grandpa loves to talk about his first fast in Lithuania, when he was 13. He slips into Yiddish as he relates how, days before the fast, he would choose a ripe apple, stick whole cloves into it, and keep it in his pocket to use as homemade smelling salts if he felt faint. On the way home from synagogue, he ate it.

With our family finally gathered around the table, grandpa and papa say Kiddush, then they dip challah and apples into honey for a sweet year, and the dinner begins.

What I love the most about this ceremonial meal is that it has been passed down in our family from generation to generation. I love looking around the room, thinking back to the dinners of our ancestors and forward to the meals of my children's children's children. And then someone interrupts me to please pass the horseradish.

Although Jews all over the world eat symbolic foods on Yom Kippur, each country interprets this differently.

Moroccan Jews, and Jews from the island of Curacao, break the fast by drinking coffee topped with a fluffy mixture of beaten egg yolks and sugar. Jews from Greece say that lemonade quenches thirst better than anything else, while Iraqis eat hariri, a sweet non-dairy milk made of almonds.

One of the oldest and most widespread customs is the eating of sweet foods, particularly honey, to symbolize a universal hope that life will be sweet in the coming year. Dried fruit, sugar, and honey are used to sweeten main courses, salads, vegetables and of course, desserts. Dates appear in all kinds of recipes, because they are sweet. They're also symbols of beauty and peace.

Fish is served as a token of wisdom, fortune and fertility. Whole, baked fish – especially carp, with the head intact – reminds us that we should strive to be at the head of our peers and an example of righteousness to all. It is also a symbol of immortality, except among the Iraqi Jews, who don't eat it during the holiday because the Hebrew name for fish is similar to the word for worry.

Blessings are said over plentiful, seasonal vegetables because they are considered symbols of abundance. Glazed carrots cut into circles remind us of gold coins, leeks are eaten for luck, and large winter squash symbolize the hope that we may grow in fullness of blessing.

Other foods are eaten because their Hebrew names are puns on words in holiday prayers. Israelis cook ordinary green "bottle" squash into a special dish because bottle sounds like part of the prayer asking that our enemies be chopped down. We eat dates because the word sounds like part of the blessing in which we ask to be cleansed of sin.

Certain foods are avoided for the same reason. Ashkenazi Jews won't eat sweet and sour foods or nuts because the Hebrew name equals that of sin in Jewish numerology. And the words sweet and sour, in translation, could forecast trials and tribulations in the coming year. Foods such as olives and eggplant are also avoided because the words are a symbol of darkness or evil.

GLAZED CARROT COINS

8 large carrots, sliced in rounds salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 tbsp. butter
½ tsp. dry mustard
½ tsp. fresh ginger, grated
½ tsp. nutmeg, freshly grated
2 tsp. honey
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
½ cup freshly squeezed orange juice
1 tsp. orange zest
2 tbsp. fresh chives, minced

Simmer carrots in boiling water until almost tender. Combine salt, pepper, butter, mustard, ginger, nutmeg, honey, lemon juice, orange juice and orange zest in saucepan; cook at medium heat 1 minute, just to heat through. Pour over carrots. Simmer until carrots are glazed, about 1 minute. When ready to serve, top with chives.

VEGETABLES OF PLENTY SALAD

A delicious salad of seasonal vegetables, featuring leeks, which Turkish Jews believe bring good luck.

4 medium-sized fresh leeks, white part and 2 inches of green tops
1 medium Spanish onion, sliced into circles
1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
3 carrots, sliced into circles
½ cup water
1½ tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 tbsp. minced parsley
pinch of sugar
pinch of salt and freshly ground pepper
1 pound fresh green beans

Clean and drain leeks well to remove all loose dirt. Slice crosswise into ½-in. pieces and set aside. Sauté onions in olive oil over medium-high heat. When they are tender but not browned, add leeks, simmer, stirring often, about 5 minutes longer. Add remaining ingredients, except green beans, stir gently to combine. Simmer 10 minutes. Gently stir in green beans, simmer covered 8 to 10 minutes until vegetables are tender. Serve warm. Or to serve in the Turkish manner, serve chilled. Serves 6-8.

Ottawa doctor pioneers DNA collection, storage

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Thanks to television, movies, not to mention recent large-scale human tragedies, most of us are familiar with DNA identification.

Crime stories show how long-forgotten "cold cases" can be revived and solved using DNA matching. And we've read of the ethical debate about forcing accused criminals to submit DNA samples to be stored and tested for past and future crimes.

Underlying the debates over its uses is the question of how DNA can be easily collected and reliably stored, and Ottawa's Dr. Chaim Birnboim has been instrumental in solving those problems.

Originally from Winnipeg, Birnboim began his scientific career at Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. in Chalk River, Ont., where he developed technology that has been used around the world in DNA interpretation.

In 1984, he moved to Ottawa to become head of the research program at the Ottawa Regional Cancer Centre. The author of three patents and more than 90 scientific papers, he was named "Innovator of the Year" in 2002 by the National Research Council.

While looking for an easy and reliable method of collecting DNA samples from patients during colon cancer surgery, Birnboim came up with an idea for an alcohol-based fixation technique that acts like formaldehyde but is even more reliable and useful for pathologists because it doesn't damage DNA.

His discovery eliminated the need for a pathologist to be present in the operating room for every biopsy or surgical procedure. The process, called GenoFix, was patented by Cancer Care Ottawa.

In 1998, five years after he first began work on GenoFix, Birnboim and a partner set up a company to develop and market his discovery, and DNA Genotek Inc. was born.

"Very few people were doing this in the early years when I was working on GenoFix," said Birnboim.

"There has been a big push at universities across the country to combine science and business. It has become more respectable for academic scientists to do so."

The next challenge was to find a simple, cost-effective method of collecting the DNA. Traditional collection methods, including using needles to take blood, were a bit cumbersome for everyday use.

Oragene, Birnboim's latest brainchild, is a simple and reliable DNA collection kit that can be used by anyone. It has a small vial with a screw top and a special solution inside. A subject simply spits into the vial and screws the top back on, shaking to mix the solution with the saliva. DNA preservation and purification begin immediately.

Oragene is a simple and reliable DNA collection kit that can be used by anyone

The markets for Oragene are vast and, indeed, it is currently being sold worldwide. It is easy and inexpensive to use, ship and process, making it attractive for insurance companies, as well as for such things as paternity tests, genealogy, child-find programs, family records, and even for collecting DNA from convicted felons.

"I am proud that we have been able to set up a biotech company and assemble an excellent management and technical team. This has been no small feat in this challenging time to raise funding," said Birnboim.

"However, it turns out to be an excellent time to launch our new DNA collection product because of the increasing demand for DNA samples for medical testing, research and genealogical purposes."

For more information about Birnboim and the company, visit its Web site at www.dnagenotek.com.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am making dinner for a large group this year on Kol Nidrei. What is the best thing to serve before the fast?

A. You want to serve a combination of foods that take longest to digest so that you feel full as long as possible, and also drink a lot of water to avoid getting thirsty. Make sure it's water not juice, alcohol or pop or other drinks that contain sugar and sodium that can make you thirsty.

In terms of what foods to combine, you should have a substantial serving of lean protein, so chicken, fish or turkey would be great. Have some complex carbohydrates, such as brown rice, barley, legumes, whole wheat pasta or whole wheat couscous; and lots of hearty vegetables like broccoli, cauliflower, brussels sprouts or carrots.

Avoid a lot of white sugar and white flour foods like challah and desserts. For dessert serve berries rather than melon, and if you need dessert, make either oatmeal cookies or a banana bread with whole wheat flour. Have an easy fast.

Q. I have heard that honey is a healthier alternative to sugar. Is this true? Does it have as many calories?

A. Honey does contain some minerals – calcium, phosphorus, iron and potassium, but only trace amounts. Like sugar, honey is a pure carbohydrate source and actually contains more calories per tablespoon. Honey has 18 more calories per tablespoon than refined white sugar. Honey however does have superior flavour to sugar in many foods, so continue to enjoy it – in moderation of course.

Q. I have heard that honey is unsafe for young children. Is this a fact?

A. Honey is unsafe for all children under one year of age. Honey can contain spores of botulism, a bacteria that can give off deadly toxins and that babies do not have have sufficient resistance to. Avoid giving honey to all babies, and watch for it in yogurt, vanilla ice cream, bread, cereals and baked goods.

Q. I have been working at improving the balance in my family's dinner. I cut back on desserts and have reduced the volume and type of carbs that I serve. I am getting complaints though now that everyone is hungry. What else can I serve?

A. Soup is a great solution this time of year. It is filling, nutritious and easy to make or buy. Just avoid cream soups. I think you'll find this to be a great solution.

Belgian court throws out cases against Sharon, Yaron

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — Belgium's highest court Sunday threw out war crimes complaints against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Ministry Director General Amos Yaron for their involvement in the 1982 Sabra and Shatilla massacres in Beirut, as well as a case against former U.S. president George Bush Sr. and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell for war crimes during the first Gulf War.

The Cour de Cassation ruling puts an end to attempts to prosecute foreign leaders in Belgium for war crimes based on complaints filed by private citizens from foreign countries, and is expected to soothe Belgium's diplomatic relations with Israel and the United States, which had hit their lowest points in decades.

The Israeli embassy in Brussels said, "The ruling will enable us to rehabilitate the relations between the two nations."

The cases were based on a Belgian "universal jurisdiction law" that allowed complaints alleging genocide and war crimes against foreign leaders to be filed by non-Belgians about events that took place abroad.

The law was drastically amended over the summer to avoid politically motivated complaints. A group of Palestinians lodged the complaint against Sharon, and earlier this year, the government temporarily withdrew its ambassador from Brussels.

The complaints against Bush, Powell and U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney were filed on behalf of seven Iraqi victims of the 1991 Gulf War.

Cheney served as the U.S. defense secretary during the war, while Powell was chairman of the joint chiefs of staff.

Annoyed by the spate of such cases against Americans, Washington said the NATO alliance would have to move out of the Belgian capital because of the law. Belgian Foreign Minister Louis Michel said Sunday it was "a fact that as long as complaints based on the universal jurisdiction law were not thrown out, we cannot resume [high level] official contacts with the U.S."

Last Tuesday, a lower Belgian court upheld an earlier decision to drop a war crimes complaint against U.S. Iraq war commander Gen. Tommy Franks, rejecting an appeal by a lawyer representing 17 Iraqi and two Jordanian civilians.

Under intense diplomatic pressure, the government passed a law that allows cases to be brought only if the victim or suspect is a Belgian citizen or long-term resident at the time of the alleged crime. It also guarantees diplomatic immunity for world leaders and other government officials visiting Belgium.

The biggest change is dropping the "universal jurisdiction" in the 1993 law, which had resulted in politically embarrassing complaints against U.S. officials, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Sharon, among others. The new law brings it in line with those in the rest of western Europe.

Iran warns Israel not to strike nuclear plants

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharazi, saying his country has no program to produce weapons of mass destruction, warned Israel that Iran would respond to any strike on its nuclear facilities.

In an interview aired Sunday on ABC's This Week, Kharazi said the possibility of an Israeli military strike on its nuclear program was "a threat, no question."

Israel has warned that Iran's nuclear program poses a threat to the world and was reportedly considering such a strike if Iran is pursuing a nuclear option.

"Israel knows if it commits such an action, it would be reacted," Kharazi said. He declined to be more specific, saying simply that "there will be a response" if Israel launches such a strike.

Iran faces mounting pressure to prove it is not developing nuclear weapons. Diplomats in Vienna last week said the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), had discovered traces of weapons-grade enriched uranium at a second site in Iran.

The IAEA has given Tehran until Oct. 31 to prove it does not have a secret atomic arms program or be reported to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions.

On Saturday, U.S. President George W. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin demanded Tehran give up any ambitions to build nuclear weapons.

Early last week, Iran paraded six of its newly deployed medium-ranged missiles, which military analysts say could reach Israel or U.S. bases in the Gulf.

Iran insists its nuclear scientists are not working on a weapons program but are trying to meet the country's soaring electricity demand.

Islamic Jihad claims responsibility for Negohot attack that killed two

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz
Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Islamic Jihad has claimed responsibility for a shooting attack in the West Bank settlement of Negohot last Friday, in which two Israelis, one of them a baby girl, were killed and two others lightly wounded, Israel Radio reported Sunday.

Killed in the attack were Eyal Yiberbaum, 27, and seven-month-old Shaked Avraham.

Palestinian sources identified the gunman as 22-year-old Mahmoud Hamedan from the village of Durrah, south of the West Bank city of Hebron. Hamedan was released from an Israeli prison two months ago, after serving a 14-month sentence.

At about 9:30 p.m. on Friday, the gunman infiltrated the isolated settlement from the northwest, through an area not enclosed by a fence.

Armed with an M-16 assault rifle, he knocked on the door of one of the homes at the edge of the settlement. Yiberbaum, who was visiting the home for Rosh Hashanah, opened the door and was critically wounded when the gunman opened fire. He died a short time later.

The owner of the house and a soldier opened fire at the gunman, who tried to escape, firing a number of rounds while running outside. Shots hit another home and critically wounded the baby, who also died a short while later.

An army reserve unit that rushed to the scene killed the gunman.

The wounded man and woman were taken to Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon; the woman was released to her home over the weekend.

Security forces scoured the area for other gunmen after reports were received that a second man had fled the scene. No evidence was found to back the report.

Security sources told Israel Radio on Saturday that the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) would find the perpetrators of Friday's attack.

Government officials blamed President Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority for not stopping such violence, but refused to say whether Israel would now speed up efforts to expel Arafat.

"We have information that the Palestinian Authority has not done anything in the last few days to deter these terrorist organizations from carrying out their atrocities during the religious holidays," said Avi Pazner, an Israeli government spokesperson.

Friday's attack in the settlement of Negohot came as Jews in Israel were celebrating the first night of Rosh Hashanah.

"The Palestinians have started the Jewish New Year with another bloody terrorist attack," said David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister's Office. "It's obvious that they've taken a New Year's resolution to continue with their trail of terror against Israel. The Palestinian Authority still refuses to take the necessary steps to rein in the terror and prevent such attacks from happening."

"This shows again the ugly face of Palestinian terrorists," said Jonathan Peled, an Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson. "It shows they are totally oblivious to the sanctity of life, the sanctity of religion. This is a barbaric act that raises a question about whether we have a partner on the other side."

In March, two Palestinians tried to infiltrate the settlement but were killed by IDF troops before they could carry out an attack. A general alert was given, and soldiers backed by a local emergency response squad attacked the two Palestinians and killed them. They were found to be carrying assault rifles and grenades, and one had an explosives belt. They had presumably planned to carry out a suicide bombing. No Israeli injuries were reported.

That attack took place a short while after two other Palestinian terrorists dressed as religious Jews entered the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba, shot a couple walking by the security fence and then killed a married couple in their home before being killed by IDF soldiers. Security sources believed the two attacks had been co-ordinated to be simultaneous.

Hamas claimed responsibility for both attacks.

Clarification

The article headlined "Arrested and Imprisoned in Egypt" in the Rosh Hashanah Supplement (CJN, Sept. 25) should have said that Tanya Pardo approached the French consulate in 1948 and asked for help in getting her husband released from prison, because she remembered that in the past it had intervened to assist non-Jewish prisoners. However, when she approached consular officials, she was told they would not become involved because it might jeopardize a commercial treaty between France and Egypt.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 22
• Israeli fighter pilots "downed" more than 100 German planes in joint exercises with German pilots. The drills, which took place in Italy earlier this month, showcased superior Israeli dogfighting skills. Sources did not provide figures for the number of Israeli planes "lost." In 2001, Israeli top guns bested U.S. counterparts in 220 out of 240 aerial training engagements, according to Jane's Defense Weekly.

Sept. 23
• Israel said Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti will not be part of a prisoner-release deal that has been rumoured between Israel and Hezbollah.

Sept. 24
• The family of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad is suing Lebanese guerrilla leader Mustafa Dirani, who is charged with having delivered Arad to Iran. The family filed a $23 million (US) lawsuit against Dirani in Tel Aviv District Court. (Later in the week, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hinted that Israel may trade terrorists held in Germany to obtain Arad's release.)

Sept. 25
• Staff Sergeant Avihu Keinan, 22, from Shiloh, was killed and five others wounded while a three-year-old Palestinian girl and four armed Palestinians were killed and several others wounded during Israel Defense Forces operations in Hebron and Gaza.

Sept. 26
• A full closure was imposed on the West Bank and Gaza Strip late Thursday, ahead of Rosh Hashanah. The closure has been put in place due to fears that Palestinian militants plan to carry out an attack during the holiday. Palestinians will, however, be allowed to enter Israel for humanitarian reasons.

Dissenting pilots to be called in for questioning

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Monday there would be no punitive measures taken against pilots who express regret for signing a letter of refusal to carry out operations in the territories.

The letter, signed by 27 active, reserve and retired pilots in the Israel air force, said they were opposed to carrying out "illegal and immoral" operations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"We, for whom the IDF [Israel Defence Forces] and the air force are an integral part of our being, refuse to continue to hit innocent civilians… The continued occupation is critically harming the country's security" and moral fibre, it added.

In a stormy debate held by the Knesset plenum, Mofaz said that each pilot who signed would be called in for questioning, and whoever showed contrition would be forgiven. He said any pilot "who fails to recognize that he is mistaken" would be forced to carry out other tasks in the air force.

"A soldier has no right to refuse a legal order, and the IDF issues only legal orders," Mofaz said. He accused the dissenting pilots of signing the letter for political reasons, of distorting facts and of deceiving the public.

On Sunday, the signatories of the letter were joined by IAF fighter pilot Lt.-Col. Eli, who serves as a flight instructor together with Colonel Yiftah Spector, one of the original signatories. Eli said he decided to sign after IAF Chief Maj.-Gen. Dan Halutz's announcement that harsher measures would be taken against flight instructors who signed, saying they were not "the people who should educate the next generation of pilots."

Earlier Sunday, Colonel Ran, another one of the original signatories, said he regretted signing and had changed his mind.

In a letter to the IAF chief, the active-duty pilot wrote that he signed the letter due to pent-up feelings of bitterness over the occupation, but that it was now clear to him that the path he took was wrong, causing his family and friends to view him as a "refusenik" though "he was not one." He stressed that he "has never refused to carry out a command."

Ran's move came after a slew of criticism of the letter from government figures and from fellow pilots. In response, the pilots who signed said that his reversal demonstrates the extreme difficulty each member has faced in making the decision.

South African minister defends Israel

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The Israeli occupation is not "apartheid," despite contrary claims made by Palestinian leaders and their supporters in the European left and the Third World, says South Africa's minister for home affairs.

"The Israeli regime is not apartheid. It is a unique case of democracy," Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi said in an interview with Ha'aretz last week at a conference marking former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres' 80th birthday.

"Armed struggle and violence do not solve problems, only create them, and generate more violence, in a vicious circle of revenge and counter revenge, as happened [in South Africa]," he said.

Buthelezi is a perennial rival of the African National Congress (ANC) ruling party in South Africa. A member of the ANC before it opted for armed struggle after Nelson Mandela's arrest in the 1960s, he abandoned the movement and in 1975 founded the Inkatha Freedom Party, which he still leads. ANC leaders accused him of splitting the black consensus in South Africa and tried to persuade him to support the use of political violence, but he remained firm.

Buthelezi, who recently set up a new political bloc with Tony Leon, the leader of the Democratic Union, intends to challenge President Thabo Mbeki in presidential elections next April.

Population growth slips below 2% in 2002 as Jewish majority grows grayer

By AMIR TEIG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's population at the end of 2002 was 6,631,000, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported on the eve of the Jewish New Year.

The 2002 data show that the population growth rate was 1.9 per cent. This, statistics bureau officials say, is close to the rate recorded in Israel during the 1980s in the years before the wave of immigration from the former Soviet Union.

Regular population growth, they add, comes from nature, not from immigration. The 2002 statistics record 95,000 births and 34,000 deaths and point to a slight, yet persistent proportionate decline in the Jewish population. At the end of 2002, Jews were 76.8 per cent of the population compared to 77.2 per cent the previous year.

On the other hand, in 2002, Arabs made up 19 per cent of the population, roughly the same percentage as when the state was founded.

In 2002, the Jewish population's growth rate was 1.4 per cent, virtually the same growth rate as 2001. Last year, the Muslim sector's growth rate was high, at 3.4 per cent; the Druze rate was 2.1 per cent, and Christian Arab growth rate was 1.3 per cent.

There were some 1.9 million households in Israel in 2002. Most of these, 1.5 million, were family households, while the remaining 356,000 were people who live alone. Some 20 per cent of the households in the Jewish sector have single people, while in the Arab population, the figure is just five per cent.

The vast majority of households, 85 per cent, are Jewish, with just 13 per cent being Arab. The high proportion of Jewish households results from their smaller size – on average, a Jewish household has 3.1 people, compared to 5.1 for Arabs.

The Jewish majority is the oldest population sector in Israel. About 12 per cent of Jews in the country are 65 and older, and of those, some 46 per cent are over 75. The Muslim population is the youngest, with just three per cent being older than 65.

Population density in Israel has risen steadily over the years. In 2002, the density figure was quite high, at 299 people per square kilometre. The density when Israel was founded in 1948 was 43 people per square kilometre.

Population density is high compared to other countries the region. The figure in Syria is 89 people per square kilometre, and in Egypt it's 68.

Israel's resolve to 'remove' Arafat backfires

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel's recent decision to oust Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat from office marks its latest foray into ostracizing him. But like all its previous efforts to sideline Arafat, this attempt also seems to have backfired.

Last month, amid mounting tensions between Israel and the Palestinians, the Israeli cabinet decided in principle to "remove" the 74-year-old Arafat. Israel's rationale was that he is an insurmountable obstacle to peace.

The decision, though politically significant, was vague in terms of Israel's intentions and timing. Would he be exiled, further isolated or simply assassinated?

Israel's deputy prime minister and former mayor of Jerusalem, Ehud Olmert, upped the ante by suggesting that killing Arafat is a possibility. The foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, countered with a statement that the physical elimination of Arafat is not official Israeli policy.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who has branded Arafat a murderer and pathological liar and likened him to Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, was conspicuously silent during the debate over Arafat's future. But last week, he reiterated his desire to "remove" Arafat.

Israel's resolve to remove Arafat – the ultimate survivor – from the scene is nothing new. Before and after becoming prime minister, Sharon consistently dismissed Arafat, his longtime nemesis, as a possible negotiating partner.

When the Palestinian uprising escalated in 2001, Israel confined Arafat to his compound in Ramallah, partly demolished it and destroyed his fleet of helicopters.

As well, Sharon declared Arafat "irrelevant" and began boycotting all but a few foreign diplomats who had visited him in Ramallah.

Israel's newest campaign to render Arafat irrelevant was initiated by Shaul Mofaz, the defence minister and former chief of staff.

In mid-August, prior to the breakdown of the hudna, the temporary ceasefire renounced by Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade in August, Mofaz accused Arafat of encouraging attacks against Israel.

On Sept. 2, a day after Israel declared an all-out war on Hamas, Mofaz said Israel had made "a historic mistake by not expelling him two years ago," and declared he must "disappear from the stage of history."

On Sept. 12, a day after Israel formally decided to remove Arafat, Israeli newspapers published a story disclosing that an elite Israel Defence Forces unit had been ready to snatch Arafat from his headquarters during Operation Defensive Shield in the spring of 2002.

Israel's formal decision to remove him seems to have strengthened Arafat, who is widely regarded as the iconic guardian of modern Palestinian nationalism and a shrewd politician.

By all appearances, Arafat's stock has risen, both among the Palestinian masses and in the international arena.

Palestinians have staged vigils in front of his compound, promising to protect him from harm. It hardly matters whether these love-ins were fabricated or genuine.

More importantly, Arafat wields full authority over the PA once again. Arafat forced his first prime minister and rival, the hapless and ineffectual Mahmoud Abbas, to resign after refusing to cede control of the all-powerful security forces. Ahmed Qureia, Abbas' would-be successor, is completely beholden to Arafat. Israel has gone on record as saying it will not cooperate with "anyone taking orders directly from Arafat." So that leaves the already tattered road map peace plan in shreds.

On the world stage, Israel's determination to rid itself of Arafat has plainly failed. The Arab world has condemned Israel's policy, the European Union has described it as a "terrible mistake," and the United Nations has urged Israel to drop its threat against Arafat.

Even the United States, Israel's ally, has warned Israel not to expel or kill Arafat. Washington, as U.S. President George W. Bush said last week, considers Arafat a "failed leader" who has "betrayed" the Palestinian cause and undermined the road map.

Yet the Bush administration believes that Arafat's expulsion or assassination would turn him into a martyr, leave a dangerous political vacuum in Palestinian autonomous areas (which have been re-occupied by Israel) and bolster the fortunes of rejectionist elements who abhor the prospect of reconciliation and peace.

Israel, therefore, is stuck for now with Arafat, a man who has survived crises, wars and even an airplane crash.

Palestinian author Said dies

Jewish Telegrapahic Agency

NEW YORK — Edward Said, a leading advocate for the Palestinian cause and a Columbia University professor, died late last Wednesday at a New York hospital after a long battle with leukemia.

The author of more than a dozen books, Said, who was 67, was an outspoken critic of Israel who used his intellectual standing to promote the Palestinian cause.

Born in Jerusalem, raised in Cairo and educated in the United States, Said had been a professor of English and comparative literature at Columbia since 1963. The publication of his memoir several years ago caused a stir when it turned out that he had fabricated a significant part of his family history in an attempt to paint Israel in a bad light. He lied about his family being forced out of its Jerusalem home by the Haganah on the eve of Israel's 1948 War of Independence. They had, in fact, left voluntarily for Egypt before the war.

More recently, Said was photographed throwing rocks at Israeli soldiers along the Lebanon border.

The Gates of Heaven

A Chassidic Legend

Rabbi Yisrael ben Eliezer, known as the Baal Shem Tov (which means Master of the Good Name), was the founder of the Jewish philosophy known as Chassidut. His teachings emphasized the importance of prayer, loving G-d, and loving all Jews. He lived in Ukraine and Poland from 1698 - 1760.

"What am I doing here? Why did I come?" Itzik wondered to himself, as his eyes aimlessly wandered around the synagogue, from his father sitting next to him to a fly buzzing lazily in the open window. So it's Yom Kippur. Maybe things would be a little better if I had some idea how to pray.

Itzik had been a shepherd for his father's flock since he was very young. He had never learned how to pray. He hadn't even learned how to read. Now he sat in a synagogue for the first time in his life, with the distinct feeling that he was wasting his time. He looked around again. In the front of the synagogue, swathed in a white shawl, stood a man who seemed to be leading the prayers. In front of him was a stand on which his prayerbook rested, and in front of that, on the front wall of the synagogue, hung a large, white curtain. He wondered what it was there for. There were words on the curtain, words that Itzik couldn't read. Why did I come? What was the point? He remembered how he had begged his father to let him come. Now he felt like running away.

Something was happening. A man approached the white curtain, and pulled it open, revealing a set of doors, which he opened as well. As he did so, everybody stood up. Awkwardly, Itzik stood up as well. Everybody began singing a haunting chant. Some of them were crying.

Itzik turned to his father. "What's going on?"

"Itzik," his father responded. "On Rosh Hashana God judged the world and everyone in it. Today is Yom Kippur, and this is our last chance — the gates of Heaven are closing."

"I...I don't know how to pray. What should I be doing?"

"Look Itzik, you just stand up when the other people stand and sit down when they do, and keep quiet."

"But I don't even understand what they're saying!"

"Itzik, shhh! You want the whole place to know that you're a fool?"

Itzik was silent. But inside, his thoughts tormented him. Why can't I also pray to God? If only I knew how!

Everybody sat down, and Itzik absentmindedly joined them, but his mind was elsewhere. He barely saw the rabbi get up to address the congregation, and, lost in his reverie, didn't hear what he was saying.

Rabbi Yisrael looked lovingly at the assembled people, but his face was clouded with worry. "My dear children," he said, "our prayers are not getting through the gates of Heaven — the gates are sealed. We must try harder. We must pray from the bottom of our hearts. Only then will we be able to break open the Gates of Heaven." He returned to his place, and the prayers resumed, more intensely than ever.

Itzik wasn't listening. I wish I could pray to God. I wish there was some way I could reach out to Him. I bet God doesn't just take prayers in Hebrew. But what do I say to God? I bet God wants me to pray to Him in my own way. But what is that? There's only one thing I know how to do: take the sheep to water, let them drink and whistle to call them back — that's it! I can whistle! I can whistle to God!

And he did!

He didn't notice that the synagogue had fallen silent as the people gaped at him. He didn't see that his dumbstruck father had gone crimson with shame. He was whistling to God. He was whistling to his God.

"ITZIK!" roared his father. "What are you doing?"

Abruptly, Itzik stopped, and looked up at his enraged father. A wave of humiliation enveloped him as he realized what he had done.

But Rabbi Yisrael beamed at him radiantly and announced, "Our prayers have just been accepted. This boy has opened up the gates of Heaven."

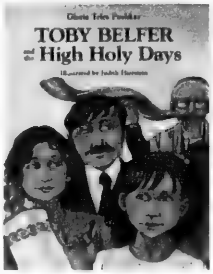
A time to say we're sorry

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When we think about Rosh Hashanah, we think about apples and honey, wonderful meals, going to the synagogue with our friends and family, and hearing the shofar. But there is another part of the holy day that is just as important.

We are supposed ask forgiveness from anyone we might have hurt in any way over the year, and if possible, to make it up to them. Of course, just as we hope that God will forgive our sins,we forgive anybody who has done anything to us that we don't like.

Toby Belfer, in the book Toby Belfer and the High Holy Days by Gloria Teles Pushker, with illustrations by Judith Hierstein (Pelican Books, 2001) understands that, and takes it very seriously. When her friend Donna comes to visit her, Toby says, "Donna, if I've done anything to hurt your feelings, I'd like to say I'm sorry."



Gloria Teles Pushker
TOBY BELFER and the High Holy Days
Illustrated by Judith Hierstein

She realizes that she has hurt Donna's brother's feelings by teasing him. She offers to read him some books from the school library. "Sometimes you should do more than just say you're sorry," she says.

Toby tells Donna about Rosh Hashanah, what happens at the services, how the family celebrates at home and about honey cake and apples and honey.

She also tells her about Yom Kippur. Donna explains what Jews do on these holidays, but she also explains why. For instance she tells Donna that fasting "is their way of saying they are sorry for promises broken and for breaking God's rules like honouring parents and teachers and being truthful. They are showing their repentance by fasting."

Don't think that Toby Belfer and the High Holy Days is a really really serious and solemn book. Toby's dog Windy has so much fun listening to Toby and Donna, that she brings her puppies to listen too – and they look just like Windy!

Also, you will find Toby's grandmother's recipe for honey cake, and it sounds yummy.

This book is one of a series of books about Toby Belfer and her family, including Toby Belfer's Seder and A Belfer Bar Mitzvah.

(Folk) tales that will touch your heart

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the good things about all the holy days that come at this time of the year is that you have time to read just for fun. One book you might enjoy is called A Journey to Paradise, and Other Jewish Tales (Pitsopany Press, 2000).

This book is a collection of folk tales that Howard Schwartz has turned into wonderful short stories. Giora Carmi did the pictures. Many of the stories are what we call parables – they teach a lesson. But they are great even without the lesson!

My favourite story is called An Apple From the Tree of Life, an old tale from eastern Europe. The daughter of the sultan (king) of Turkey was very ill, and no one knew what to do. Finally, one doctor said, "Nothing can help her now except for an apple from the Tree of Life," which grew in the Garden of Eden. The sultan called in three famous rabbis and ordered them to get such an apple within three days or he would banish all the Jewish people. (That's one of the threats many rulers frequently made to Jewish communities – and they carried out those threats, too.)

The rabbis and the others in the community had no idea what to do and they were frightened. Then Leah, the daughter of one of the rabbis, found someone to help. In fact, to the rabbis' surprise, Leah, through a miracle, got the apple and saved the sultan's daughter, and thus also the Jewish community.

Another story is about King Solomon, who was supposed to be one of the wisest men who ever lived. Hearing that a certain girl was destined to marry a certain boy, he decided to test whether destiny could be changed. He had the girl carried away to a distant island where there were no other people and an eagle fed and cared for her.

Unbeknownst to King Solomon, a young man was shipwrecked on the island. The two met, fell in love and married with the eagle who was guarding the girl as their witness. They had five children. The king found out (after all, the eagle was bringing food for seven people instead of just one) and also found that the young man was indeed the one fate had intended the girl to marry.

Other stories are about a midwife who helped a demon have her baby; a desperately poor man who played a trick on the silly people of the town of Chelm so that he could feed and clothe his family; and one about a rabbi so holy and pure that God himself welcomed him into heaven.

These are the kinds of stories that our grandparents and great-grandparents used to listen to and tell each other. But even today they will touch your heart.

The Human Stain examines race and identity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Coleman Silk is an eminent scholar, one of the first Jews to teach in the classics department of an American university. But there is much more to Silk, supposedly the son of a Jewish saloon keeper, than meets the eye.

Silk, the figment of Philip Roth's imagination and the central character in his best-selling novel, The Human Stain, has been adapted to the screen by Robert Benton of Bonnie and Clyde fame.

The film, like the novel, is an examination of race, identity and prejudice in American society.

Premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival and scheduled to open here on Oct. 3, The Human Stain stars Anthony Hopkins as Silk, Nicole Kidman as his last love and Gary Sinise as Silk's friend and alter ego Nathan Zuckerman.

Set in 1998, when the United States was enmeshed in the Monica Lewinsky scandal, The Human Stain is essentially about the phenomenon of "passing" in the United States.

Historically, many light-skinned African Americans pale enough to "pass" as whites left the black community. By doing so, they gained freedom from discrimination. But in the process of assuming new identities, they tragically cut themselves off from their roots and their families.

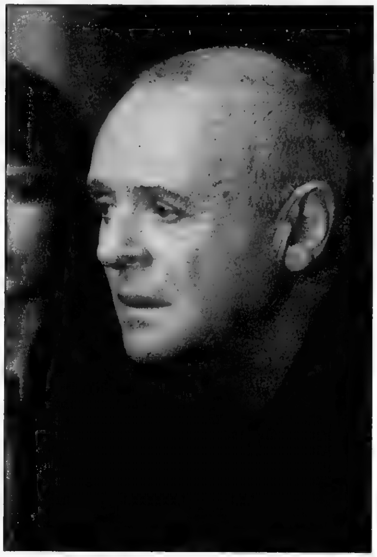
In his novel, Roth wrote of Silk: "All he'd ever wanted from earliest childhood on, was to be free, not black, not even white – just on his own and free."

In Benton's adaptation of Roth's novel, the last of a trilogy about postwar America, Silk, a mulatto whose mother calls him "white as snow," takes on the identity of a Jew.

There is no explanation as to why Silk opts to become Jewish. But it is crystal clear why he feels compelled to reinvent himself.

Silk's father is portrayed as a proud, upstanding, dignified man. But in his job as a train porter, he is subjected to daily slights and humiliations.

Young Silk, played to perfection by Wentworth Miller, wants to unshackle himself of this burden. But he is hurt, too. His romance with a beautiful white girl (Jacinda Barrett) of Scandinavian stock crashes on the rocks of reality. She ultimately rejects Silk, whom she loves dearly, because she cannot break with the taboo of interracial marriage.



Anthony Hopkins as Silk in The Human Stain.

Chastened by this incident, Silk informs his mother that he intends to conceal his real identity to his latest Caucasian girlfriend. Hearing this, his mother blurts out, "You're white as snow and you think like a slave."

Silk, nevertheless, submerges himself in white society. But in an ironic turn of events many years later, when he is a distinguished professor, a black student in his class accuses him of racism. In the name of political correctness, his distinguished career is shattered.

Even in this life-changing instance, Silk hides his true identity. The only person he confides in is his much younger lover, Faunia, a woman of some social coarseness whom Kidman portrays with considerable skill. Not even Zuckerman is privy to his secret.

The imperative of race has turned Silk into a conflicted person, but this inner tension is rarely evident in Hopkins' face or mannerisms. In fact, one wonders why Hopkins, who is so lily white, was cast for this role.

It is not the only problem bedevilling the film. Midway, the narrative sags, and a viewer loses interest. But on balance, The Human Stain is an insightful, empathetic look at race and identity in the United States.

Expect sing-alongs at klezmer gig

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Jewish music in downtown Toronto may seem as quirky as hip-hop in Thornhill. But the jazzy Hugh'sroom on Dundas Street West, not far from a strong eastern European neighbourhood, is hosting the klezmer band From Both Ends of the Earth Oct. 9.

So confident is pianist Marilyn Lerner in the band's live concert appeal that she says, "The upbeat tunes will probably provoke singalongs." The group will play renditions of their self-titled CD released two years ago, along with some new material.

From Both Ends of the Earth, which has sold 2,700 copies of its CD so far, offers interpretations of traditional Yiddish and klezmer music, recreating classics such as In Mayn Garten by Chaim Bailik and the tender Mayn Rue Platz by Morris Rosenfeld.

"This music allows me to go back to my roots," says Lerner. "I find that feel, that communal emotion." She says working with the band's other musicians has created a unity due to their Jewish heritage.

David Wall harmonizes sweetly on the vocal tracks, a skill undoubtedly honed during his current gig as singer with the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band. Rick Lazar, who can trace his roots to the ancient Assyrians, is an impressive percussionist who plays a diverse array of instruments, such as the dumbeq and finger cymbals. Bassist Daniel Koulack has toured with the klezmer group Finjan and the Knappen Street All Stars. Paul Pacanowski, the band's most recent addition, who plays woodwinds, studied music in Poland, Germany and Toronto.

The world-music vibe that comes from the troupe highlights the cross-genre creativity embedded within each song. Lerner describes their music as "sweet and rocking," essentially a mix of the old country and a new groove. That blend can often attract unexpected fans, Lerner says, recalling the Flying Bulgar tour in Sweden where "young, sweaty kids were dancing to our music like they were at a rave."

Lerner is certain younger generations will find klezmer.

"If it's survived this long, it will survive forever. It's our job, as musicians, to continue its growth, and to get people to listen to it."

Its appeal is universal, she says.

"Jewish music has such a rich tradition, it hits you hard.

"This beautiful music allows us to inject a modern interpretation."

Lerner is looking forward to playing Hugh'sroom, a venue with "New York style.

"They even have a grand piano for me," she says.

Hugh'sroom, 2261 Dundas St. W. Thursday, Oct. 9 at 8:30pm. Tickets are $13 in advance, $15 at the door. Call 416-531-6604.

New play blends Joseph story with Canadian history

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Jason Sherman, the author of Patience and Reading Hebron, once said the way his plays tend to combine Jewish themes with provocative drama upsets Jewish artistic directors, who would rather stage plays of affirmation than confrontation.

His latest play, Remnants, is also a work of confrontation. Running until Oct. 26 at Tarragon Theatre (416-531-1827) , Remnants blends the story of Joseph from the Bible with Canada's disgraceful 1930s-era pockmark: its denial of entry to many Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi Europe.

Sherman has covered this subject before, adapting None Is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper for the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre. Canada's anti-Semitism hit him so hard, he felt the need to write about it (to compare, Canada allowed 5,000 refugees during the 12 years of Nazi rule compared to the United States' 200,000).

Remnant's first act concentrates on Joseph (Dmitry Chepovetsky) and his 12 brothers, who are led by a gruff father (Victor Ertmanis) with a soft spot for Joseph and Benjamin (Kyle Horton). The other brothers grow jealous of Joseph's family position, and they plot his exile out of Poland. The scheme is quarterbacked by Judah (Alex Poch-Goldin), who rebels against Judaism with statements such as "Prayer? Why pray on Shabbos? It's just another form of work."

Director Richard Rose emphasizes Joseph's bond with his father in tender one-on-one scenes, often spotlighted in the middle of the stage. The loss of those moments highlight Joseph's pain as he struggles to find work as a quiet immigrant with little English skills. When he begins to interpret dreams for fellow workers, elements of his life fall into place unexpectedly and soon-to-be prime minister Mackenzie King (Ertmanis) brings Joseph into the servant family.

The seven actors do double duty, such as a Polish brother who becomes a British servant. Ertmanis flips his character most deliciously, from forlorn father to anti-Semitic immigration minister Frederick Blair.

Sherman brings the refugee crisis into focus when Joseph rises into the rank of the prime minister's adviser. The most fascinating plot twist (I won't spoil it) is when Joseph must make an executive decision in the face of emotional attachment. Chepovetsky captures a torn man's mind, and his baby-faced innocence shadows the turbulence beneath.

Jerry Franken and Dmitry Chepovetsky (Joseph) in Remnants.

While a serious Sherman is not as fun as a light-hearted Sherman (as in The League of Nathans), chewy ideas become fodder days after the play's viewing. Does hate beget hate? Can someone ever forgive another's hurtful sins? On the eve of Yom Kippur, Remnants is a timely reminder, for Jews and non-Jews, that we are all brothers vying for peace of mind.

But, then again, it wouldn't be fair to say that non-Jews could appreciate the play as fully as Jewish viewers can. A satire of Adon Olam, the agony of assimilation and the characters' strength in the face of hatred resonate to a Jewish audience with the force Sherman has honed in his 10-year playwright career. This writer writes what he has to write, we learn, not what mainstream theatre wants.

Orly Castel-Bloom explores reality of Israeli life

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

With her new book Human Parts (Key Porter Books), Israeli author Orly Castel-Bloom has found a social reality that blends perfectly with her surreal style.

Three years after suicide bombings and economic depression have engulfed Israeli life, an absurd reality of despair, isolationism and death have become the dysfunctional norm for many people in the region.

Welcome to the Castel-Bloom world, where strange cold weather systems, fatal Saudi flus and ongoing terrorist attacks prevail against the mundane routine of daily life.

Born in 1960 in Tel Aviv, where she lives today, Castel-Bloom is the winner of the 1990 Tel Aviv Prize for Literature, and her best-known book, Dolly City, has been included in the UNESCO collection of representative works, which, according to its Web site, was created to promote "mutual understanding among peoples."

Unlike Dolly City, which firmly established her as an absurdist, Human Parts exposes the complexities of life in Israel through social realism.

For the characters trapped in Human Parts, historical idealism appears foolish and cruel when juxtaposed against the harsh nature of current life in the Jewish state. Yet, in Kafkaesque style, the protagonists persevere, despite the complications in their lives.

The cast of actors and the events around which they manoeuvre are as shallow as the soap opera characters they watch on Israeli television, and their banal actions are described with as much drama and suspense as are the funerals of the victims of terror attended by the president of Israel, Reuven Tekoa.

The author's skill at bringing the obsessive nature of Israeli life to the page is underscored by the diversity of the characters' backgrounds. Sephardi and Ashkenazi, Ethiopian and Russian characters intermingle the way they would on Israeli streets. Gender issues are also explored within the context of the Israeli experience.

Kati Beit-Halahmi and Iris Ventura portray a world in which a maternal obsession to provide for their children is stymied by a culture that both promotes female independence and encourages stereotyped roles.

Iris, for example, is a divorced Ashkenazi woman who is left almost destitute by her wealthy husband. She decides that if she is ever penniless, she could become religious and hope that one of the non-profit organizations run by the Sephardi Guardian of the Torah Party (Shas) would help support her children.

The men, Adir Bergson and Boaz Beit-Halahmi emerge as self-centred and selfish, despite their occasional acts of compassion. Efforts to help with the overwhelming needs of his friends in a society besieged by death and funerals leaves Adir with a detached desire to search for peace and quiet in Canada.

Then there is the voice of Tasaro Tasama, the Ethiopian immigrant flown by the air force to Israel in Operation Shlomo. The new immigrant passes through life in the sex trade around the Tel Aviv central bus station before going on to become a successful model and lottery show hostess. It is with clarity and determination that Tasaro pursues a traditional life as a mother and wife.

With an intuitive understanding of the world around her, Tasaro's quest for acceptance and normalcy reminds the reader that human nature and the desire to survive prevail.

On national TV, Tasaro tells her audience not to despair if they don't win the lottery.

"Maybe next time," she says.

While references to Hebrew months and surreal weather conditions emphasize the disconnectedness Israelis must feel from their current environment, the fast-paced narrative in Castel-Bloom's world absorbs her audience and compels them follow the characters through to the end.

Orly Castel-Bloom will be reading from her work at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., Oct. 28 at 8 p.m.

TOVAH FELDSHUH BRINGS GOLDA MEIR TO BROADWAY

After playing to sold-out houses in an off-Broadway theatre for four months, actor Tovah Feldshuh is bringing her strong and assured portrayal of Israel's legendary prime minister Golda Meir to Broadway's Helen Hayes Theatre.

Feldshuh stars in the one-woman show Golda's Balcony by William Gibson, which relives the critical events of Israeli history from the founding of the state to the Yom Kippur War. Feldshuh "gives such a fiercely committed performance that she does more than just resurrect Golda Meir: she embodies an entire country," raved the New York Times.

The play opens Oct. 3. www.goldasbalcony.com

Dayan, Rabin, Sharon in Spotlight: History Television marks the 30th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War by airing Slaves of the Sword, a three-part series that explores the lives and political careers of Israeli leaders Moshe Dayan, Yitzhak Rabin and Ariel Sharon.

Directed by British journalist Paul Jenkins, the series uses never-before-seen archival footage as well as interviews with friends, family members, politicians and critics who best knew the three generals-turned-politicians.

Slaves of the Sword makes the obvious observation that Israel's political leaders, by historical necessity, were forged by their military experiences in the army, but then questions whether they ever stopped being "slaves of the sword" in their role as statesmen.

According to a press release, the series "asks if there will ever be peace in the Middle East with warriors leading the way." Is this a biased attempt to blame Israel for being repeatedly called upon to defend its survival? Not according to Cindy Witten, spokesperson for Alliance Atlantis Broadcasting, who defends the series as "an in-depth examination of the three leaders and an important perspective on current developments in the region."

Judge for yourself. The episodes air back-to-back on Sunday, Oct. 12, beginning at 6 p.m.

Daniel Pearl Music Day: The Royal Conservatory Orchestra presents "Harmony for Humanity," a concert celebrating the life of Daniel Pearl, the American Jewish journalist slain by terrorists in Pakistan last year. The tribute marks Pearl's 40th birthday and is presented in association with PEN Canada. Concerts are also scheduled for many other cities, including Jerusalem.

"We're thrilled that this year leading artists from many musical styles and traditions are joining with us in a clarion call for asserting the oneness of humanity," said Pearl's father, Judea Pearl.

Arts in Brief

- Ryerson Theatre School presents The Laramie Project, Moises Kaufman's controversial play about how a community reacts to the brutal death of a homosexual university student. Adults $16. Abrams Studio, 44 Gerrard St. E. Oct. 1 to 11. 416-979-5118.
- From Both Ends of the Earth consists of musicians keen on interpreting traditional Yiddish music in a modern light: Marilyn Lerner (piano), Daniel Koulack (bass), David Wall (vocals), Rick Shadrach Lazar (percussion) and Paul Pacanowski (clarinet/ soprano sax). They perform at Hugh's-room, 2261 Dundas St. W. $13 in advance, $15 at the door. Oct. 9, 8:30 p.m. 416-531-6604.
- The Civic Light Opera Company presents The Happiest Millionaire, a madcap musical comedy with songs by the Academy Award-winning team of Richard and Robert Sherman. $17.50. Fairvew Library Theatre, Oct. 9 to 11. 416-469-8450.
- Poet Simcha Simchovitch's latest collection, Out of the Abyss, features works selected from a lifetime of writing. It features an introduction by critic Adam Fuerstenberg and a cover drawing by recently departed Toronto artist, Ernest Raab. Send $25 to S. Simchovitch Fund, 17 Tillplain Rd., North York, Ont., M3H 5R1.

At the Galleries

- The exhibition "Homescapes: Functional/Dysfunctional" features mixed media works by Rochelle Rubinstein, Anne Shabason and Lyndia Terre. At the Lyndia Terre Gallery, Alton, Ont., until Oct. 26.
- "Israel Now," an exhibition of photographs by Beverley Abramson, continues at the Reuben & Helene Dennis Museum through Oct. 9. Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St.
- "Diversity" is an exhibition of recent paintings by Josef Kote, a painter of vivid, impressionistic street scenes. Until Oct. 18. Peterson Fine Art Gallery, 18 Hazelton Ave. 416-975-0931.

Woody Harrelson directs new play

By KATHRYN KATES

Special to The CJN

Actor, artistic director and producer of production company macIdeas, Marcello Cabezas created quite a stir when he and his team of producers landed television and movie actor Woody Harrelson to direct the Toronto premiere of Kenneth Lonergan's first play, This is Our Youth.

"We got Woody through the traditional channels of going through his agent," said Cabezas, who also stars in the play. "He loved the script. We then went to New York and read for him. It was one of those magical moments when he told us we were awesome and rearranged his schedule so he could come to Toronto and do it. Let me tell you, it has been like the utopian creative collaboration, a total memorable experience."

Cabezas describes This is Our Youth as a 48-hour snapshot in the lives of three young people. The play, which takes place in Manhattan's Upper West Side in 1982, centres on Warren Straub, Dennis Zeigler and Jessica Goldman, who grew up as left-leaning, wealthy, articulate, pot-smoking teenagers in the liberal '60s and are now lost in the big city at the beginning of the Reagan years.

Cabezas plays Warren, a dejected 19 year old who steals $15,000 from his abusive lingerie tycoon father.

"Warren Straub is the lost puppy," he says. "He's the guy whose family has come apart. His sister was murdered nine years ago, his father in not very supportive of him. The family has material wealth, but at the same time are very much void of love wealth."

All three characters are Jewish, Cabezas says. "I think the Jewish audience will get a kick out of some of the subtle Jewish humour."

This isn't the first time the 20-something Cabezas has played a teenager on stage. Last year, he performed the title role in macIdeas' production of Vladeck, which is currently being produced by CHUM Television as a 90- minute nationally televised special.

"Vladeck was only 16 years old. It is about getting in the head of these people and really understanding where they are coming from. Technically, it is a specific cadence in speech, a certain kind of desperation of being young. I think it is not as difficult as it seems. It is about the physical look, but it is also about disposition and posture."

In addition to directing This is Our Youth, Harrelson is spreading his gospel of healthy living to his cast.

"All of us eat healthy, but Woody is a big proponent of simple organic living, which is a completely delectable organic experience. We went to theatre school where we were taught that your body is your instrument, but sometimes you forget. He's kind of refocused us in terms of the commitment with emotional and spiritual warm up before rehearsal and how essential that is in theatre to really achieve that emotional light.

"At the end of the day, there has been a lot of focus on this project, and if we can get younger or different demographics – which don't normally come to see theatre – because this play has been marketed like a movie, then we've done our job."

The play is on at the Berkeley St. Theatre Upstairs, 26 Berkeley St. until Oct. 18. For tickets, call 416-368-3110 or Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111.

JEWS ASKED TO VISIT ISRAEL IN 5764; NEW OPPORTUNITIES BECKON

Israeli tourism officials project that 1.2 million visitors will have visited Israel in 2003, a 45 per cent increase over the dismal year of 2002.

Officials of the Israeli Ministry of Tourism are working hard to boost that number for the coming year. During the High Holidays, tourism pledge cards are being placed on synagogue seats across the United States and Canada, inviting worshipers to pledge to visit Israel during the coming year.

"The best way we can access North American Jews is through the synagogue," says Israel's Tourism Minister Benny Elon.

Project Go Israel is not limited to North American Jewry. Elon is inviting Christians as well to join the tourism drive.

Tourists departing Israel were polled last year on the sites they visited. By far the most popular site was the Western Wall in Jerusalem, which 42 per cent of respondents said they had visited.

About 20 per cent had visited the Mount of Olives and 18 per cent the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, both in Jerusalem. Other highly-rated sites include Ancient Jaffa and Tel Aviv (18 per cent), Masada (15 per cent), the Israel Museum (13 per cent), Caesarea (11 per cent) and Capernaum (8 per cent).

More than half of all tourists reported visiting a museum, 44 per cent visited holy sites, 35 per cent went to the beach or scuba-diving, while only 7 per cent attended a cultural event. The survey, which was meant to give tourism officials a better understanding of the goals and interests of visitors, seems to highlight Israel's unique position as an unparalleled religious destination for Jews and Christians around the world. That shouldn't be a surprise to anyone.

Judean Archeological Dig: Volunteers are needed for an archeological expedition to commence this month in the Judean Desert, with the object of finding further Dead Sea Scrolls and antiquities that may exist in previously unexplored caves.

Haim Cohen, an Israeli archeologist, is to lead an expedition this month to the "pool cave" and "mikveh cave" near Ein Gedi, in undisputed pre-1967 Israeli territory. It is the first such exploration of the caves since the 1960s, when they were deemed too difficult to excavate and were left relatively intact.

Cohen believes the caves to be of significance because both have mikvot (ritual baths) from the period of the Second Temple at their entrances.

An expedition from Haifa University earlier this year revealed that the two caves were probably used by Jewish freedom fighters during the period of the Second Temple and the Bar Kokhba revolt. The caves were also occupied during the Iron Age and Cohen is expecting finds dating back to that period as well.

Helicopter Tours: Helicoptour, a 35-year old Israeli company, offers private or group helicopter tours that depart from VIP helipads all over the country. Working with Israel's ministries of defense, tourism and foreign affairs, the company has hosted nearly every visiting celebrity and foreign dignitary to Israel.

Helicopter touring is custom-made for those who have visited Israel many times because it offers fresh new angles on well-known sites. Because the country is compact, one may admire mountains, valleys, sea shores, farmlands, deserts and bustling cities, all in a single flight.

In Israel, explorations by helicopter are especially exciting because so many awesome biblical sites can be seen from the air. www.cnairways.com/Helicoptour or 011-972-9-952-0520.

Turkish Bath Museum: The Israeli port city of Akko, designated a UNESCO world heritage site, has been digging out its underground Crusader city for decades, if not centuries. Recently, it restored a vast steam-bath complex that had been neglected for at least half a century. Built by the Ottoman Turks in 1795, the El-Basha Turkish bath (hamam) has been transformed into a charming museum.

The El-Basha is a giant and elegant network of marble-lined steam rooms, domed massage areas, ornate scrubbing rooms and relaxation chambers. Here, in a ritual invented millennia ago by the Romans, Ottoman Turks would soothe away the day's aches, sweat and grime. Opened in June, the new Hamam Museum recaptures that experience with the aid of pewter sculptures of bathers to help re-create the sultry atmosphere of the Turkish bath.

Twenty minutes north of Haifa, Akko is one of four UNESCO heritage sites in Israel; the others are the Old City of Jerusalem, Masada and Tel Aviv's "White City" architecture. Known in English as Acre, the town has been a draw for visitors ever since it became the capital of the Crusader Kingdom in the 12th century.

Rolls-Royce dealer David Geneen expects to sell up to 15 Phantoms a year

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"It's all about exclusivity, the latest technology and, most of all, luxury."

David Geneen, an automobile aficciondo since boyhood, is talking about one of the ultimate status symbols and marques, the Phantom – the gleaming British-handcrafted car that turns heads, inspires a mixture of awe, curiosity and jealousy and empties wallets.

At $584,000 after taxes – the cost of a fairly spacious home in a decent neighbourhood – the Phantom is "an enormous indulgence," Geneen readily conceded. But there is no shortage of customers.

The sole proprietor of Canada's first Rolls-Royce dealership, Rolls-Royce Motor Cars, which opened last month, he expects to sell 12 to 15 Phantoms – the only model – at his Hazelton Lanes showroom this fiscal year.

It takes more than a high disposable income to purchase a Phantom, only 400 of which will be manufactured in Rolls-Royce's British facility in 2003.

Passion and flamboyance are the other two mandatory requirements, said Geneen, who also owns Grand Touring Automobiles, a purveyor of high-end Jaguars, Bentleys and Aston Martins.

The person who purchases a high-flying Phantom is not buying basic transportation, but rather the most expensive production sedan money can buy, said Geneen, a member of Holy Blossom Temple who comes from a long line of rabbis.

The 19-foot Phantom, with its 6.75 litre V12 engine and distinctive grille, weighs 2½ tons and combines effortless refinement with substantial power and performance.

Boasting a top speed of 260 kilometres per hour, the Phantom's acceleration is nothing less than awesome: zero to 95 kilometres in 5.7 seconds flat.

Redolent of the finest Corinthian leathers, hand-matched wood grains and buffed stainless steel, the Phantom's interior is the last word in opulence. Not being a mass produced car, the Phantom is assembled over a five-week period.

Geneen, who acquired the Canadian Rolls-Royce franchise late last year, can think of only one car that is more exclusive, the $1-million-plus ultra-sporty Enzo Ferrari.

Geneen, who drives a black 1961 Phantom, the precursor of the current model, explained that his buyers are always men, "though women may be in the background of the discussion."

Previous Rolls-Royce owners do not have to be persuaded to shell out half a million dollars for a new Phantom. But if a first time buyer is considering an acquisition, months may elapse before a deal is signed and sealed. "People have to be convinced it's for them. It's usually a car they've wanted all their lives. We don't get a lot of impulse buyers."

The price, however, is not carved in stone. "We don't resist a fair offer. We're here to sell cars." If you plan to haggle, be forewarned that a two per cent reduction is the furthest he can go.

Geneen, 55, has been in the car business since his teens.

Born in Glasgow, Scotland, he is the son of Ben and Pearl Geneen, who immigrated to Canada in 1956.

Ben was a psychiatrist and Pearl, who started the first cooking school in Toronto, was the owner of The Complete Kitchen shop in the Yorkville district. His sister, Lucy Waverman, is a local food columnist.

Of Russian, Polish and Latvian ancestry, the Geneens lived in what he described as "simple circumstances" after settling in Toronto.

"We had a nice middle-class lifestyle in Glasgow. In Canada, we chucked that all away." At least at the beginning.

David Geneen and the Phantom

When he was still a student at North Toronto Collegiate, Geneen bought and sold British-made cars. "In those days, the late 1950s and early 1960s, British cars were considered stylish but not reliable for Canadian winters."

Geneen was impressed by the consummate craftsmanship, the quality of the finishes and the immaculate design. "I was driving fancy cars, Jaguars, at 17 and 18. Cars gave me a sense of self. You felt rich, like a king," he said.

Preoccupied by cars, Geneen was no bright star academically. "I did badly at school. I struggled. The only thing I understood was cars. It was in my blood. It was my shtick."

A year before finishing high school, he dropped out to open a used car lot on the outskirts of Toronto. Naturally, he specialized in British makes such as Triumphs and MGs.

"I lasted five, six years, and then I moved on to be a leasing advisor at a Lincoln-Mercury dealership in Toronto. I learned discipline there."

In 1976, he struck out on his own again, opening another used car dealership. But this time around, he sold European and American exotics and antique cars.

Geneen began selling Japanese Mazdas in the 1980s. "I respected Mazdas, but I had no passion for those cars. I wasn't interested. I sold the business in 1990."

Thinking he had missed something by dropping out of school one year shy of a high school degree, he studied liberal arts at York University. "I managed to get good marks, and was able to spend more time with my children," said Geneen, the divorced father of two: Daniel, 13, and Julian, 9.

Geneen then joined Grand Touring Automobiles in a managerial capacity. After a year, he bought out owner George Minden.

Incongruously located in one of Toronto's working-class neighbourhoods, Grand Touring Automobiles is Canada's number one Jaguar, Bentley and Aston Martin dealer. Prior to winning the Rolls-Royce franchise, Geneen also sold Rolls-Royces at Grand Touring Automobiles.

Founded almost a century ago, Rolls-Royce was acquired by the British defence contractor Vickers PLC. When Rolls Royce sales fell, Vickers put the company for up sale. BMW, the German automotive firm, bought it in 1998.

Geneen had long been dreamed of being an official Rolls-Royce dealer, but the obstacles were immense.

"BMW dealers here were desperate to get the franchise. I had to convince them I could do the job. I had the connections, the cachet and the lifestyle that hooked me into this world."

If his Avenue Road Rolls-Royce showroom works out, Geneen, who compares himself to an art dealer, plans to open more Rolls-Royce "boutiques" in the city.

But for now, he has no intention of expanding his operation to the rest of Canada. "I'm not expansionist. I want to keep our foundations here strong. It needs a lot of personal attention."

Rolls-Royce owners would probably agree.

Maximilian Schell in two recent DVD releases

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two recent DVD releases deserve our attention.

The first one is the classic film The Chosen. This has to rate as one of the best Jewish films of all time and it has been virtually unobtainable over the past few years.

20th Century Fox has just released the film on DVD and it is a must see for everyone, even those who want to see it for a second or third time.

The Chosen, adapted from Chaim Potok's best-selling novel, centres on a friendship between two Jewish boys from different backgrounds.

Robby Benson gives the best performance of his career as Danny Saunders, the son and heir of a chassidic rabbi (played by Rod Steiger), and Barry Miller plays Reuven, the Americanized son of a fervent Zionist father (Maximilian Schell).

The story gives us some insight into the world of the haredim, and shows us how these two boys become friends and learn to respect each other.

It is an excellent film that should be in everyone's collection, and should be available at better video stores everywhere. If your store does not have a copy, ask them to order it from their distributor.

The second film, The Man In The Glass Booth, one of the most sought after videos in North America, has never been available on home video.

The film was released recently by Kino On Video as part of its American Film Theatre package, which produced a number of prestigious films during the 1970s and made them available in selected theatres for a short time.

The films disappeared except for occasional television presentations, but they are now available to all.

The Man In The Glass Booth is a complex story, which focuses on millionaire Jewish entrepreneur Arthur Goldman who often appears to straddle the line between sanity and insanity.

He holds forth on many topics of the day, including his family's experiences in a Nazi concentration camp.

He is abducted, however, by Israeli agents and put on trial as Adolph Dorf, the commander of the concentration camp where Goldman's family was supposedly exterminated.

Maximilian Schell gives a brilliant performance as Goldman/Dorf and the viewer is often left questioning whether the charges are true or not.

The film borrows from the Adolf Eichmann case, which was still fresh in the minds of people seeing this film when it was first shown. Now everyone can see it for themselves and make up their own minds.

It maybe difficult to find a copy in the local video stores. The best way to obtain one is through www.amazon.ca.

Entrepreneur rubs shoulders with hockey greats

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Back in the mid-1990s, Hersh Borenstein met a young woman who found it hard to believe he could make a living selling autographed pictures, equipment, jerseys and knick-knacks that once belonged to hockey players and other high profile athletes.

"You make money doing that?" she asked him.

Borenstein's ready reply is as true today as it was back then. "Everyone's got an idol, someone they worship or who brings back a key moment from their lives. For a moment, that item was theirs, held by them," he told her.

People have been paying for autographs from their favourite athlete, singer or celebrity for years, but in the last decade or more, selling personalized memorabilia and mementoes has become big business.

Borenstein's company, Frozen Pond, occupies part of a plaza in Concord, Ont., and is lined with autographed photos, jerseys, bobble-head dolls and other tchatchkes that people will pay hundreds of dollars to obtain.

Signed photographs by Masters champion Mike Weir fetch $200, but one of Weir and Wayne Gretzky, taken at Pebble Beach and decorated with a Masters flag, sells for $1,400.

A jersey signed by Gretzky will go for $1,200 – if it's an Oilers or Rangers sweater. Surprisingly, his Kings sweater sells for less, as does his St. Louis uniform.

Among current players, Steve Yzerman is the top seller, with autographed pictures going for $199. Among retired players, mementoes connected with Bobby Orr are most popular in sheer numbers sold, with the favourite item being the famed photo of the Bruins defenceman sailing through the air after scoring his Stanley Cup-winning the goal, Borenstein said.

As president of Frozen Pond, Borenstein keeps close tabs on the public's fascination with star-quality celebrities.

Hockey-themed items are by far the most popular in Canada, he said, though mementoes connected with the Canadian women's gold-medal winning Olympic team have proved to be an exception.

"I can't give it away," he complains.

Toronto-related items drive the market, with the big sellers being those connected to the strong Leafs teams of the early 1990s. Curtis Joseph was big when he was a Leaf, but even he paled behind the popular former captain, Doug Gilmour. "Third is so far back it's not worth mentioning," he said.

Other sports memorabilia sells, but it is also well back in the popularity parade.

Indeed, if Borenstein's observations are indicative of the Toronto fan's attitudes, then the Raptors are in trouble. Vince Carter was the only one who sold when the Raptors were hot, but today even his stuff is not in great demand. The Blue Jays are weak sellers and as for the Argos, forget about it.

This is Toronto and as far as sports popularity goes, it's hockey, hockey, hockey.

Trailing the 1990s Leafs in popularity is the 1960s edition of the team. That group won four Stanley Cups and still has a special place in fans' hearts. Dick Duff, a member of the '60s Leafs who also won Cups with the Montreal Canadiens, gave Frozen Pond "a whack of stuff to sell," including "all-star knick-knacks." His jersey went for $4,000, Borenstein said.

Prior to his untimely death, Billy Harris asked Borenstein to sell many of his mementoes so that he could take care of his children's financial needs. Among the souvenirs that went up for sale were his miniature Stanley Cup (it fetched $14,000), autographed programs from the 1960s, and materials with a Gretzky theme (he coached the superstar early in his career).

About seven years ago, Borenstein struck up a relationship with Mr. Hockey, Gordie Howe. A friend of Borenstein who was a promoter had arranged for Howe to appear at a hockey show, but the promoter knew very little about hockey, so he asked Borenstein to host Howe during his stay.

Borenstein jumped at the opportunity and from the time he picked up Howe at the airport to the time he bid him goodbye, the two became good friends. Since then, Borenstein has marketed loads of Howe memorabilia, pictures and other souvenirs.

He's also struck up personal relationships with stars such as Johnny Bower (number 1 in Borenstein's books as the most personable, good-natured and warm-hearted of the personalities he's dealt with), Tony Esposito, Pat Lafontaine, Jose Theodore and Rick Nash.

Nash, Borenstein believes, is a can't-miss superstar of the future – both on the ice for the Columbus Blue Jackets and in the sports souvenir business.

"He's big, good-looking, personable and a hometown boy – the full package," Borenstein said.

Such is the marketing power of Frozen Pond that Borenstein readily admits that as far as selling Nash-related materials goes, "we're market makers."

By featuring the young star in Frozen Pond's catalogue, but promoting him heavily, Borenstein has the clout to make Nash a must-have among collectors.

Ninety-percent of Borenstein's business is mail-order and is generated by ads placed in The Hockey News and online with the NHL, with which Frozen Pond entered into a strategic agreement last year.

As the NHL's licensee and official merchandise partner, the company supplies product to the NHL's auction site and can now sell merchandise with the NHL logos. Business has surged thanks to the arrangement.

It's heady stuff for a guy who started out selling his own sports cards at a trade show at the Bond Place Hotel when he was only 14 years old.

"It was something I always did. I did it to excess."

That same year he saw a store going out of business at the Centerpoint Mall that was selling Gretzky dolls. Borenstein bought the entire stock at $6 each and put an ad in a trade paper, selling the dolls in the United States for $12.99 (US). He ended up selling almost 600 of the dolls, with his mom, Shari, helping him pack and ship the merchandise down south.

He turned his hobby into a career in the early 1990s, partnering in a card store at Yonge and Dundas while studying economics at York University.

Thanks to a friend, he met hockey star Pavel Bure and had him autograph hundreds of photos. He paid Bure $4 each and sold 700 at $14.99 within three weeks. "I said, hmm, I have something here."

Paul Coffey was the next big-name player who signed memorabilia for him, followed by famed Soviet goalie Vladislav Tretiak.

Most of the money was made through mail order, and the realization dawned on Borenstein that he really didn't need a partner in a store.

His business grew steadily and in the mid-'90s, with a $10,000 bank loan, he created a 12-page catalogue that he published in The Hockey News. A year later, he opened his own store on Mt. Pleasant, south of Eglinton and he hasn't looked back.

A strategic partnership with the Hanson Brothers – made famous by their appearance in the 1977 Paul Newman movie Slap Shot – proved lucrative and he expanded his merchandising agreement to become their agent for appearances as well. The Hansons were so popular that even Buffalo Sabres players begged Borenstein to introduce them.

In the first five years of the Mt. Pleasant store's existence, sales increased by 60 per cent per year.

Frozen Pond outgrew the premises and had to move to its spacious new quarters. Borenstein continued to expand the mail order business, shipping product to fans in 31 countries, including Slovenia, Austria, Japan, France, the Czech Republic and even Guam.

With its role as marketing agent for Nash and with "strategic relationships" with other young stars like Ilya Kovalchuk and Marian Gaborik, Frozen Pond promises to be on the scene for years to come.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I believe 5764 could bring peace to the world, food to the hungry, liberation to our souls, lofty thoughts to our minds, and awe to every person's heart – if we choose to make it so.

I believe the Toronto Jewish community could be even more of a light unto other Jewish communities if we began wishing "Shabbat shalom" to those who pass us on the way to shul, whether they were heading to the Holy Blossom or to the Agudah.

I believe our community would be healthier and our children happier if we accepted that many of them are suffering from severe forms of drug and alcohol abuse.

I believe it would be refreshing to many if a fundraising dinner honoured a poor man for loving his family, community and Israel.

I believe our community is slowly beginning to value the artist and his canvas and the poet and her sonnet rather than just the businessperson and his investments.

I believe that the Jewish people could once again be the People of the Book, and that intermarriage would decrease dramatically, if our teachers presented the many faces of truth within Torah and the wondrous possibilities of the ages, rather than parochial and insular views stemming from fundamentalism and fear.

I believe the Jewish world could fight anti-Semitism more effectively if we trained every community member to become an ambassador to the rest of the world, equipped with the knowledge required to break down stereotypes and impart the exquisiteness of the Jewish people.

I believe peace could be achieved between Israel and the Palestinians if trust could be developed between those who are weary of the deaths of their sons and daughters.

I believe Israel needs Diaspora Jews to visit and invest in its economy, and to understand its importance to the entire Jewish world.

I believe Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur would work better if more of us understood prayer. I also believe more Jews would be committed to the development of the self, and tikkun olam, changing the world, if they believed in the High Holy Day prayer, "Who shall live, and who shall die?"

I believe the world could stop war and killing if we invested billions of dollars into grassroots workshops on peace, tolerance and respect, instead of guns. I also believe we could feed the entire world, if we wanted to. And I believe the Jewish people are creative and able to play a momentous role in realizing both eventualities.

I believe the multi-hued leaves of southern Ontario in the fall reflect the radiance of God's palette and are a gift to those who open their eyes wide enough to see them.

I believe that the elegance of the world outweighs its vulgarity and that our fine deeds prevail over our terrible acts. I believe that because of this, our world exists and that we have it within us to make this earth shine like the gem it could be.

Shanah Tovah.

CHEESE BLINTZ MUFFINS

1 lb. part skim ricotta cheese
3 eggs
2 tblsp. sour cream or yogurt
1/2 stick butter, melted
1/2 cup baking mix (like Bisquick)
1/3 cup sugar
fresh blueberries

Mix all ingredients except blueberries together well. Spoon batter little more than halfway into muffin tins. Top each muffin with a blueberry. Bake at 350°F for 30 minutes or until lightly browned. Can be made in mini muffin tins, but check after 15 minutes for doneness. Serve with sour cream. Great for breaking the fast!

About Life

Dear Ella,

I've been dating Esthie for almost a year now and I really think she is the girl I will end up marrying.

She comes from an observant home, but since she moved out a few years ago, she has not been as careful in her religious observance. She is no longer shomer Shabbat and she doesn't keep kosher anymore. I, on the other hand, have never done much more than attend a seder now and then. Religion hasn't gotten in our way till now.

Her parents have invited us to their home to break the Yom Kippur fast. Apparently they have no idea that Esthie has changed her ways. She wants me to go and pretend I fasted, just to keep the peace in her family. She said they would be hurt to know that she was dating someone who wasn't at all observant. She lies to them all the time about how observant she is now. What do you think?

Living a Lie

Dear Living a Lie,

It's not religion that's getting in your way, it's values.

Families can be very powerful forces. Esthie's retreat from observance is a huge move, and she is obviously not comfortable enough in her new lifestyle to be able to tell her family.

You, on the other hand, have very ingrained principles, or lying to her parents on Yom Kippur would not be an issue for you. Don't compromise those principles! I know there has to be give and take in a relationship. However, when you are asked to adjust your values, you are adjusting the essence of who you are.

Esthie has been lying to her family. So asking you to do the same does not seem like a big deal.

If the two of you plan to spend the rest of your lives together, the details of her observance will have to come out at some point and be dealt with.

You should either go to her home for the breaking of the fast and be honest, or don't go at all. Esthie should respect your decision because it is part of who you are, and that is the person she has fallen for.

Advocacy agencies restructured

Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy created

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) last week announced the creation of a new community organization that will play a major role in setting policy and allocating funds to national Jewish advocacy organizations.

As a result, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and national campus organizations should see a boost in their cumulative annual budgets of up to $5 million, raised through annual federation fundraising campaigns, said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIAFC.

The "functional framework" of the new Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) should be in place in three months. Although final details concerning its role are yet to be finalized, plans are for CIJA to set overall policy, manage each organization's budget and co-ordinate activities for advocacy agencies, she added.

As well, CIC will no longer be a partnership of major Jewish organizations, including community federations, Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF). Instead, CIC will be headed by a board serving as individuals, not as representatives of a particular group, and B'nai Brith and CZF will no longer have a role in CIC activities.

The announcement culminates months of speculation about the involvement of an "emergency cabinet" of high-profile businesspeople involved in the restructuring efforts.

No end in sight to the intifadah

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Comment

After three years of terrorism, military operations, recession and failed peace missions, Israelis and Palestinians have finally agreed on something: there is no light at the end of the tunnel.

Last week, Palestinians throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip – and Arabs in Israel – celebrated the third anniversary of the intifadah with rallies, marches and political pronouncements.

In Palestinian-populated cities, masked militants marched through the streets in political demonstrations marking the campaign of violence launched against Israel at the end of September 2000, but the rallies were relatively small.

Their size suggests either popular exhaustion with the intifadah or caution after Israel's strikes against terrorist leaders and its threat to expel Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

For Israelis, the optimism of Rosh Hashanah did little to sweeten expectations for a new year free of suicide bombings and terrorist ambushes.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Fence Route Opposed

TORONTO — The group Canadian Friends of Peace Now (CFPN) says Ottawa should follow the United States and tell Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that Israel's security fence between itself and the West Bank cuts Palestinians off from their land by seizing their territory. It also violates Israel's commitments in the peace process and prevents an eventual peace deal, the group said. Co-president Av Sohn said last month in a statement that Israel is justified in protecting itself against suicide bombers and that a fence may be useful, but it should follow the 1967 border. CFPN said Sharon has "turned [the issue] into a political ploy to deepen Israeli occupation of the West Bank."

Sephardi President

MONTREAL — FEDERATION CJA has named community leader Sylvain Abitbol as its new president. He is the first Sephardi to hold the position. Abitbol is chief executive officer and president of the high-tech firm NHC Communications. He pledged to help those in need in the community, to combat anti-Semitism and defend Israel.

ISRAEL

Economy to Grow

JERUSALEM — Israel's economy may have bottomed out, according to Globes newspaper. Israel's gross domestic product is expected to grow by 1.1 per cent this year, the Israeli business newspaper reported, citing the country's Central Bureau of Statistics. Per capita growth, however, is forecast to be minus 0.7 per cent.

Barghouti Petition

TEL AVIV — Two U.S. couples have petitioned Israel's high court to have Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti charged with crimes against humanity in order to prevent his release in a future prisoner exchange, their lawyers said last week. Barghouti, the head of the Tanzim militia in the West Bank, is representing himself at a trial in Israel for allegedly planning terror attacks that killed 26 Israelis. Petitioners Revital and Alan Bauer, who was injured along with his son in a 2003 attack, and Avner and Pnina Franklin, whose daughter was killed in a 2002 attack, filed the petition amid summations in the case last week. In his statement, Barghouti, who was arrested in April 2002 in the West Bank, gave a political speech and repeated his claim that, as a politician, Israel has no right to try him. He also said he would be released soon, but didn't elaborate.

Ariel Inside Fence?

JERUSALEM — The West Bank town of Ariel will be inside Israel's security fence, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon reportedly told a Likud party meeting last week. Ariel is several miles beyond the Green Line boundary that divides Israel proper from the West Bank. Cabinet later approved the move, though the Ariel section of the fence will not yet be connected to the main fence closer to the Green Line. U.S. officials have warned the cost of building the fence around some West Bank towns may be deducted from loan guarantees to Israel.

WORLD

Shchitah Threatened

LONDON — A British vegetarian group has launched a new campaign against kosher and halal slaughter in the United Kingdom. Vegetarians International Voice for Animals is resuming an effort begun several years ago because the semi-official British Farm Animal Welfare Council recommended this summer that all animals in the country be stunned before slaughter. The group is planning a mass lobby of Parliament on Nov. 19. Jewish authorities have ruled unanimously that stunning an animal before killing it renders its meat not kosher, said Rabbi Jeremy Conway, head of the kashrut division of London's rabbinical court.

Banned Opera Revived

NEW YORK — An opera banned by Hitler about a heroic Jewish woman will get a second life in New York. The 19th-century opera, La Juive (The Jewess), by French composer Jacques Halevy, is about a Jewish woman boiled in oil for refusing to convert to Christianity. It will debut Nov. 6 at the Metropolitan Opera, 70 years after Hitler banned it, the New York Post said.

Conan the Apologizer

LOS ANGELES — As part of his campaign for California governor in that state's recall election, Arnold Schwarzenegger has apologized for a 1986 wedding toast to Kurt Waldheim. "It was a mistake," he told the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angles last week about his toast to his Austrian compatriot Waldheim, the former UN secretary general who covered up his service in a pro-Nazi unit during World War II. Schwarzenegger has been an active supporter of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

A Soapy New Year

LOS ANGELES — ABC last week aired an episode of the soap opera One Life to Live in which the show's Jewish character celebrates Rosh Hashanah with her son. During the episode, character Nora Buchanan and her son Matthew celebrated Rosh Hashanah and looked forward to the start of the new year. They talked about having cast off their sins into the river, and lit candles and said Kaddish for loved ones. During the celebration, Matthew confesses to Nora that he tried to get her back together with his father, Bo Buchanan.

Part of Temple Mount Wall Collapses

JERUSALEM — Part of an interior wall of the Temple Mount has collapsed, exposing dirt and fill in an area above the Western Wall.

The wall, part of the Islamic Museum on the Temple Mount, collapsed last week. The section – about 120 square feet – is visible to worshippers in the Western Wall plaza.

Archeologist Eilat Mazar, a member of the Committee to Prevent the Destruction of Temple Mount Antiquities, told Arutz Sheva radio the collapse could lead to others and is connected to illegal construction on the Temple Mount by the Muslim Waqf, or religious trust, which administers the area.

"It is frightening to think of this collapse," Mazar said. "This collapse should be a warning bell. If a catastrophe occurs, the whole world will blame Israel."

The relatively minor collapse is the latest structural fault to affect the Wall. The Waqf has resisted attempts by Israeli archeology officials over the years to shore it up. Earlier this year, Jordanian engineers were called in to help repair a huge bulge in an outer wall.

Jewish representation cut in Liberal landslide

Young loses, red tide carries Kwinter, Caplan

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jewish representation in Ontario's legislature was cut by one in last week's Liberal landslide victory, with former attorney general David's Young's upset loss in Willowdale.

David Caplan

Young, who was the lone Jewish representative in Ernie Eves' Tory government, was defeated by Liberal David Zimmer, chair of the Toronto Community Housing Corp., by 1,883 votes in the battle of the Davids.

Liberal MPPs David Caplan and Monte Kwinter were returned to office by comfortable margins.

Rumours were swirling soon after the vote that Kwinter, a Liberal stalwart since 1985, would be returning to cabinet, or possibly, appointed Speaker of the House.

Kwinter told The CJN the morning after the vote that he'll serve in any capacity Premier-elect Dalton McGuinty chooses.

While welcoming his victory, Kwinter, 72, sounded curiously bitter, saying "some members of the Jewish community worked to elect my opponent, notwithstanding [the fact] that every riding with a Jewish presence won with more votes than last time."

Kwinter, who held cabinet posts in the previous Liberal governments, said he found it "a little discouraging for people to berate me" about his leader's pledge to abolish the popular Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), which provides tax relief for parents of children in faith-based schools.

Earlier this summer, Kwinter won plaudits in Jewish circles for breaking ranks with his party and voting with the Conservative government to entrench the tax credit into law – the sole Liberal to do so.

Despite his stance, he found it "rather disturbing that some members of the community didn't recognize the fact that what I did took courage."

Kwinter said it's important for the community to have a voice on the measure in the new government. "We'll see what we can do to find some accommodation."

He's now won six consecutive terms. In the last vote, he lost just one poll in the riding. This time, he lost two, but trounced his Tory rival by more than 10,000 votes.

Conservative MPP Tina Molinari's narrow loss in Thornhill was seen as a disappointment by the community. Molinari, who won the riding by a mere 343 votes in 1999, became one of the tax credit's biggest boosters.

Monte Kwinter

Thornhill is Ontario's most Jewish riding, at 33 per cent, and is home to the largest number of Jewish day schools in the province.

Both Molinari and Young championed some form of tax relief for private school parents as early as 2000.

This time, Molinari lost to longtime Vaughan councillor Mario Racco by 781 votes. The win should give Racco some satisfaction, as he had the federal Liberal nomination snatched from him in 1997 when Prime Minister Jean Chrétien appointed Elinor Caplan as the candidate.

2003 NEGEV DINNER TRIBUTE in honour of
ELI AND RENÉE RUBINSTEIN
in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2003
Sheraton Centre Hotel
Reception: 5:00 p.m. • Dinner: 6:00 p.m.
Negev Dinner Chairman: Ron Frisch • JNF Toronto President: Frank A. Wilson and a Campaign Team of over 200 volunteers
Proceeds from the 2003 JNF Toronto Negev Dinner will establish a recreation area and park for mothers and their children in the community of Bnei Brak which is located approximately 5 kilometers northeast of Tel Aviv, near Ramat Gan. This project will provide the opportunity for families to relax and enjoy an outdoor setting in a park-like atmosphere, part of which will be a playground area.
SPECIAL PRIZE — A random draw at the Negev Dinner will provide two FREE return economy tickets to Israel, compliments of El Al Israel Airlines. To qualify for this draw, donors must make a minimum gift to this year's Negev Dinner of at least $360 and purchase at least one ticket to the event itself.
As well, Skylink Travel has very generously donated 2 weeks in Israel at either the Crown Plaza in Tel Aviv or Jerusalem to be used in conjunction with this trip, which will cover the cost of accommodation.

Lest we lose our optimism

From the editor's desk

I seldom comment in this space on news reports or commentary in other media about Israel. The anti-Israel slant is sufficiently prevalent in certain quarters that I would be constantly commenting on it. Moreover, The CJN already features a weekly column – According to Reports by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee, one of Canada's pre-eminent media experts – which does precisely that: comment on other media.

But sometimes I make exceptions.

I was aghast at a CNN report carried by Global Television on its 11:00 p.m. newscast last Monday night. The CNN correspondent, Fionnuala Sweeney, was reporting on the third anniversary of the "intifadah," the war launched by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat against Israel on Sept. 28, 2000.

Sweeney began her report in the following way: "It was three years ago that the Palestinians rose up in defiance of Israel in their fight for statehood."

Her voice was recorded against the usual visual backdrop, file footage of stone-throwing Palestinians squaring off against well-armed Israeli soldiers. Then there were the scenes of the Israeli riot police attempting to control the violent, but obviously young Palestinians on the Temple Mount as they hurled stones and rocks upon Jewish worshippers at the Western Wall below.

Next in the report was the participation, by now mandatory, of Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi, who recounted the events that led to Sept. 28. Not surprisingly, Ashrawi attributed the rioting by the young Palestinians to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount, which she characterized as a provocation to Palestinian sensibility. And so on.

The report had one theme and one message: the Palestinians are waging a fight for their freedom against an overbearing, monstrous Israeli oppressor.

Sweeney did mention suicide bombings by Palestinians, but she did so en passant, as a tactic that evolved from the throwing of stones, indeed forced upon them, she implied, by the circumstances of their disadvantage.

Sweeney did not utter a single word about the fact that the Palestinians did not have to "fight" for statehood at all since it was offered to them in negotiations at Camp David and at Taba by the prime minister of Israel, nor a single word about the fact that a number of PA officials have openly admitted Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount was a pretext for the violence that had been planned weeks prior to his walkabout, nor a single word about the fact that the recruitment by Arafat of anti-Jewish, Islamic extremists to wage terror against Israelis may have irrevocably changed Palestinian society as well as the nature of the conflict itself.

More than a misstatement of history and a distortion of the facts, the report was irresponsible and an offence to truth. It was propaganda masquerading as news.

Masked Palestinian gunmen rally in Gaza to mark the third anniversary of their intifadah.

Woe to the society where truth is irrelevant to the purveyors of the news. Truth is the foundation of justice and justice is the pillar upon which peace can rest secure.

The toll of Arafat's duplicity has been incalculably tragic. Statistics convey numbers; they cannot convey loss.

The severest numbers, of course, have been the ones that quantify the loss of life. In all, more than 3,300 people have been killed: 2,477 Palestinians and 860 Israelis (as of the end of September).

Another of the incalculable losses among Israelis and Palestinians that Arafat has engineered has been the loss of optimism. As is reported elsewhere in this issue, most Israelis and Palestinians do not see a light at the end of this increasingly long tunnel. They see protracted struggle.

The Palestinian economy that had shown such positive signs of expansion during the Oslo heyday has been devastated. The economy is creating few jobs, and few of those are any but menial jobs.

With so little prospect for their future, is it any wonder that younger Palestinians are turning to Hamas, Islamic Jihad or the Al Aksa Martyrs Brigade? In the absence of meaning through work, youth will opt for the possibility of meaning through notoriety. And in the society that Arafat has nurtured, whose major instruments of influence glorify and glamourize violence and especially shaheedism (becoming a martyr), there is no greater notoriety than that which follows the attempt to kill Israelis.

It will require great inner strength to prevent the loss of optimism from taking root within Israeli and Palestinian society and within ourselves as well.

JEWISH EDUCATORS VISIT ISRAEL: This past summer, 31 Jewish and general studies educators from Jewish day and supplementary schools in Toronto took part in an 11-day seminar in Israel. The goal of the program, which was sponsored by UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, the Jewish Agency, Partnership 2000 and the Jewish National Fund, was to expose the teachers to various tikkun olam projects so they can bring related initiatives back to their classrooms.

CIC helps launch pro-Israel interfaith group

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A new cross-Canada interfaith effort pulling together representatives of Jewish, mainline Christian and evangelical groups aims to boost domestic support and advocacy for Israel among both faiths.

"The Forum" plans to make use of evangelical Christians' strident support for the Jewish state, organizers say.

The initiative's main plank is a four-part breakfast series to be held in eight Canadian cities until next June. It was inaugurated late last month in Toronto at a morning briefing with Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), who spoke on "Faith Groups Join in a Noble Mission," and Charles Wagner, president and international director of the Jerusalem-based Bridges for Peace, who addressed "Jews and Christians Standing Together."

Forum to build on evangelicals' support

The new group will also send missions to Israel and train those involved in media monitoring and advocacy for Israel.

Its main backers are the CIC, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto and Canadians Against Semitism.

"It's the culmination of a lot of different, parallel initiatives," Fogel told The CJN. "It signals a conscious decision to institutionalize the kind of relations we have [with Christians who support Israel.]"

An initial roster lists 54 participants reflecting a broad spectrum of groups, such as Bridges for Peace, which is dedicated to building relationships between Christians and Jews while encouraging support for Israel; the Canada Christian College; the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, an international evangelical effort; and Anti-Semitism Must End Now (AMEN).

Also on board are Liberal MP Art Eggleton, Israeli consul general in Toronto Yaakov Brosh and representatives of the Roman Catholic, United and Presbyterian churches.

Breakfast meetings are to be held in Halifax, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, and Vancouver, where Christian and Jewish speakers will make the case for Israel.

Fogel said he is aware of the problematic theology evangelical Christians bring to the table. Many believe that supporting the modern State of Israel will hasten the Second Coming, after which Jews will either embrace Jesus or perish.

Many Jewish observers, while welcoming the support for Israel, have expressed concern at the underlying agenda.

"I understand their concerns," Fogel said. "[But] we have to welcome [these Christians] to broaden the pro-Israel base as much as possible. The tent is big enough for everyone."

He said the Forum "is not meant to be anything other than a meeting place where we seek networking, inspiration and the sharing of ideas."

In the United States, evangelical and other conservative Christians have emerged as Israel's staunchest allies. Their presence has been felt in the U.S. Congress and even the White House.

The Forum is intended to help Jews and Christians achieve a mutual comfort level, after which special projects will monitor the media for bias against Israel and write letters to the editor. Christian participants will also spread the word about the need to back Israel in their churches and larger communities, the CIC says.

Members of a planned speakers bureau will drive home the point that the terrorist threat facing Israel is the same one confronting Western nations.

The group's first mission, comprised of 40 Jews and Christians, left for Israel this past Sunday for a two-week trip. The Forum expects to take missions to Israel three or four times a year.

Volunteer encourages others to support MDA

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

When Sandy Galet attended a Beit Halochem Canada – Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel fundraising concert last year, she was moved by the courage of the disabled Israeli veterans "who were making something spectacular with their lives.

"I decided that I had to help others to survive," Galet says. "I thought that the best way I could help was to support Magen David Adom."

The mother of four children and grandmother of 12, who has had an active business and volunteer career, says she wanted to find a project that would include a lot of people.

"I wanted to do something without any bureaucracy and I wanted the people to use their own ideas to help raise money for a much-needed Mobile Intensive Care Unit."

She had to find a way to raise $111,100 for the unit "with no red tape, no expenses and no board meetings."

She invited 10 women to her home last fall, and asked them to donate at least $100 each. She then asked each woman to invite 10 others to do the same thing and then to continue the process.

In the end, 534 donors held more than 40 events, including wine and cheese parties, a bowling party, cocktail parties and a telethon. They received donations ranging from $25 to $15,000 from women and men of all ages across the country. The oldest donor was over 100 years old. In five months, they had reached their goal.

Important to visit Israel

"It was my idea, but it was the work of a lot of individuals who took the idea and made it a success," Galet says.

She says her father, who lost many of his family in the Holocaust, used to say, "If there was an Israel, it never could have happened – we now have to protect Israel."

It is important to give money to Israel, she says, but it's even more important to visit Israel.

"The ambulance, with paramedics and the lifesaving equipment, is the first step in saving lives, whether at a terrorist incident, an accident or, often, in case of illness."

Galet was born in Montreal and received a degree in fine arts at McGill University. In 1964, she moved to Toronto with her husband David Galet, went on to earn a master's degree in special education at OISE and worked as a psychometrist, testing children for learning and emotional problems.

Sandy Galet

In 1984, while on a visit to Israel, she saw Naot sandals and decided that she wanted to sell them in Canada. She and Corinne Lissoos formed Solemates, a wholesale distributing company for the sandals, which are now sold across Canada, and they opened a retail store, Prairie Dog, on Eglinton Avenue West. Last year, Galet sold the business to her partner.

In addition to her work, she is an active volunteer and a founder of Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

"I called together six people, went door to door and formed the synagogue in the living room of our house."

Galet says Magen David Adom is planning a trip to Israel in late October for the ambulance donors and others. It will be led by Sara Pachter, who has led 160 tours. A highlight of the trip will be to see the mobile intensive care unit they purchased, which is stationed in Kiryat Shmonah.

For more information about the trip, contact Magen David Adom at 416-780-0034, or 1-800-731-2848.

Condolences

Last week, along with all Canadians and other freedom-loving peoples, we mourned the deaths of two Canadian soldiers in the southwestern outskirts of Kabul in Afghanistan. They were on routine patrol when the jeep they were riding in struck a landmine. Three other soldiers were also wounded in the attacks.

Sgt. Robert Alan Short, 42, a father of two from Fredericton, and Cpl. Robbie Christopher Beerenfenger, 29, a father of four from Ottawa, were killed instantly.

Defence Minister John McCallum announced the bitter news to a silent House of Commons. The deaths were "a painful reminder," he said, "that defending our values and doing our duty as a nation can come with a very high price."

The top Canadian officer in Afghanistan, Maj.-Gen. Andrew Leslie, the deputy commander of the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, or ISAF, tried to explain the loss in the only way he could.

"The mission we're on is a good one," Leslie said, "and we're helping people. We're protecting them from predators and terrorists who would like nothing better for us to either withdraw into our camps or to run away. And we are going to do neither. We're going to continue our duty here. We are not going to run away and we are not going to withdraw into our camp. I think most Canadians will understand that."

Maj.-Gen. Andrew Leslie is absolutely correct.

Most Canadians do indeed understand that.

We convey our deep sympathy and condolences to the families and friends of Sgt. Short and Cpl. Beerenfenger. We also convey our feelings of great pride and gratitude for all our armed services for "protecting [Afghanis] from predators and terrorists." For in protecting Afghanis, they are also protecting us.

Congratulations

The people of Ontario last week elected Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty as the province's next premier. We need not speculate upon the reasons for the results, nor do we have the expertise to do so. Suffice to say, Ontarians unambiguously opted for a change in their government by a very wide margin.

The broad issue of good governance in relation to the well-being of the daily lives and the secure futures for all Ontarians will always be our highest concern. But the narrower issue of seeking equity in education funding, as we have often written in the past, is also of key importance to us. Equity in educational funding is vital to a sustained, strong and positive future for our community.

We extend our congratulations to McGuinty and his party, and we pray that they will govern the complex affairs of Canada's most populous province with integrity, wisdom, compassion and fairness.

Visit Israel

I am a child of Holocaust survivors, and I just returned from two weeks in Israel, the single most unique country in the world.

My decision to go to Israel, I must admit, was fraught with indecision and fear. I realize now there are two kinds of fear. The first protects you and the other is the kind that gets in the way. It makes you believe that you may be in danger when in fact you are just justifying your own complacency. Therefore, when I finally decided not to capitulate to Palestinian terror, my resolve to go turned into an unbelievable feeling of liberation. Fear should never fully rule the heart, and as I write this letter at 4 a.m., I proudly realize that I am a victim of only one thing: jetlag.

Go to Israel. It is as vibrant and confident as always, and a gift we cannot ignore.

CJN failed its readers

I am a reader of your newspaper and mostly agree with your general standpoint. I also enjoy the news you have been bringing in to my home.

However, I cannot understand why a paper would publish an article that essentially forgives an outrageous, anti-Semitic demarche and practically grants an indulgence to anti-Semites to engage in further anti-Semitic activities ("Russian paper apologizes for 'anti-Semitic' article," CJN, Sept. 11).

Instead of studying the topic and trying to help those who want to do justice, The CJN published a mild article that finished with the words "the matter is closed."

Let me list some of the points made in the Russian Canadian Info article by Valery Serduchenko that you reported on:

- "It was the Jews who led the revolution of the last century and were in the forefront of perestroika."
- "Today's anti-Semitism has a moral justification."
- "A new bunch of Abraham's children has created a turmoil of privatization and has stripped the country to the underwear."
- "In conclusion, let me say this: Jews! Be on the alert! Do not puff out your bellies and cheeks. Serve honestly and worship the Gods of the nations who let you enter."

If you read the whole article, you will find more of these pearls.

A great loss

I humbly add my profound sadness to your obituary on one of Judaism's most significant thinkers, the late Emil Fackenheim ("A great loss to the Jewish people," CJN, Sept. 25).

To this day, I return to my bookshelf to read his books again and again. As a Holocaust survivor, I live by his teachings that stress how "the Jewish people have an obligation to survive and never despair."

His 614th commandment – that Jews should not give Hitler a posthumous victory – embodies this idea and is always relevant, especially today, as we witness a worldwide increase in anti-Semitism.

Fackenheim was one of the most important thinkers of the last 50 years. His scholarship was impressive. In all of his writings, he emphasized the centrality of Israel in contemporary Jewish life. In To Mend the World, one of his most important works, he laid open to all the foundations of Jewish thought.

May his memory be forever a blessing.

Condemns moral equivalency

Mel Shipman's characterization of Israeli policy toward Hamas as revengeful and petty (CJN, Letters to the Editor, Oct. 2) demonstrates his own lack of understanding of the current war between Palestinian terrorists, who seek to murder Israeli civilians, and the Israeli army, which seeks to capture and kill those murderers while avoiding civilian casualties at all costs. How can Shipman seriously put Hamas and the Israeli government on the same moral footing? Does he not comprehend that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is a menace to peace and that Hamas and other death cults seek to annihilate the Jewish state and purposely target the weak and defenceless, and woman and children?

Targeting members of Hamas and other death groups prevents attacks and keeps Israelis alive. Why Israel defends its people against Hamas is not, as Shipman believes, "incomprehensible." What is perplexing, though, is how Shipman could possibly seek to apply a moral equivalency between the Israeli government and the vile killers of Hamas.

Of Stone and Heart

By LEN RICHMAN

My mind was a complete blank. I moved the fingertips of both my hands slowly up and down the stone surface, over and over again, while continuing to look up, slightly pressed against it. Imperceptibly, a lump began to form in my throat. Still not focusing clearly, I was infused with a sense of awe.

Like others of my generation, I had read Leon Uris's Exodus in my youth and Israel became a dream. But life intervened, and the dream was deferred until I reached middle age.

Attaching a six-month leave to a one-year sabbatical from teaching at Quebec's West Island College, I found myself in Israel wearing an Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) volunteer uniform. In and out of uniform, on and off army bases, I was exposed to intense situations, incidents and opportunities beyond the usual tourist experiences.

The political conflicts, sustained violence and tension and dichotomies of perspective in Israel are reported regularly on our side of the world. I have no new wise analyses or ideas to offer. What is it I do want to share?

"Love at first sight" can really happen. The truly golden city of Jerusalem captured me instantly. My interval there, particularly in the Old City, was the closest I had come in years to knowing again the wide-eyed, open-hearted learning of a delighted child. Dominating Jerusalem's magical effect on me was a singular experience that still overwhelms me when I think of it, even at this distance in time and place. This is the first time I have attempted to articulate it.

We were fortunate to have assigned to our volunteer unit a young woman named Hedda. Comfortable in Hebrew, French and English, trained by the army specifically as a guide for IDF volunteers, she took us through Jerusalem's Old City and a week later, to Masada. A blue-eyed, dark-haired Sabra with dancing freckles around her nose, she had patience, perception and a rich knowledge that she imparted with much enthusiasm.

We wandered through the Christian, American and Jewish quarters. Wearing our uniforms put us at a disadvantage. We were only allowed to skirt the periphery of the Arab section's labyrinth of narrow streets. Tourists were able to move around more freely.

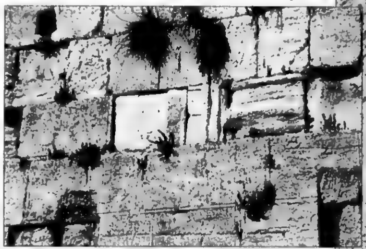
After roaming through alleys and buildings preserved since antiquity, we paused at the top of the Old City walls and then began to descend the countless stone steps leading to the Western Wall. Halfway down, we stopped for a security check.

I stood, scanning a wide scene. To the left was the steeple of a church I could not identify; to the right, the minaret of a mosque. Glinting in the sun was the Dome of the Rock. (Interestingly, I would later have an uncomfortable clash there with two Arab women after my wife had joined me overseas and I was taking pictures as a tourist, not in uniform.)

Leading to the wall below was the largest plaza I had ever seen, filled with people walking, talking in groups or standing alone thoughtfully. Little children skipped about or held onto their parents' hands as soldiers patrolled the entire expanse, including the roofs of nearby buildings. I could see a tapestry of colour and a variety of clothing. Men wearing prayer shawls and women with kerchiefs covering their heads were divided by a narrow, low partition of cloth and wood.

Arriving at the bottom of those smooth, worn steps, I walked across the square. My 20-year-old soldier attendant and friend, Avi, told me I had to put on one of the kippot available in boxes at the entrance to the wall. He would be going to an alcove on the left side for private prayer and would meet me later.

Of course, I had known about the Western Wall, a 2,000-year vestige of Herod's Temple. I had read about it and met people who had visited it. I could understand its significance to practising Jews and its symbolic import for Jews in general. Yet I never had any special attachment to it, regarding it with the same rational recognition as I would China's Great Wall or the Berlin Wall. I was totally unprepared for my reaction.



Donning our kippot, Avi and I separated, he to the left, me straight toward the wall. Standing directly in front, only vaguely aware of the men and boys in prayer on either side of me, I looked straight up at its imposing height. My eyes settled on the bits of paper stuck in the grey stones' narrow crevices: worldwide hopes, dreams, thanks, remembrances, petitions scrawled on tiny scraps and placed in those small openings.

When I finally turned away, my face was wet. I couldn't fathom why this happened. I remember thinking, as I returned the kippah to its box and walked across the expansive plaza in a haze to rejoin my companions, "Is this what is meant by a profound pilgrimage of the spirit?" I knew I had made a kind of unbroken connection to the arduous past – my own or my birthright's. Perhaps both.

As I write this now, I think that Israel for me was like an archeological dig, land and structures waiting until the propitious instance to unearth certain revelations. There was never a piercing moment of eureka in what I have recounted here, only a quiet wonderment.

Attempting to come to terms with being a Jew, especially in Canada, on my terms, not someone else's, had occupied me from late adolescence. I grew up in a modern Orthodox environment and moved to the Reform movement after I got married. Jerusalem and my meeting with that wall of stone, and a week later, the rock of Masada, were not threatening to me or a reminder of the current anxieties in Israel. The monuments were alive and inspiring, bringing me to a juncture in which I felt a rather elusive recognition, a vague acceptance taking shape, an acceptance that was until then dormant and buried under a lot of clutter.

There are puzzles still not completely resolved. And yet, some of my persistent bewilderment from the time I was a young man is not so much of a dilemma anymore.

Yes, the romantic reading of Exodus a long time ago had changed for me. Yes, I could no longer view Israel as "a light unto the nations," having discovered its people were just like people in other nations. Somehow, though, I glimpsed a personal light of clarification, something I had been seeking most of my life. Dreams are often manifested in the most unexpected ways.

It would soon be time to return the uniform, and return to my part of the world.

Praying in Hebrew

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Lately, some of us have spent an inordinate amount of time in synagogues using books in a foreign language: Hebrew. Many of us resort to the translated page in English or French, but I believe that act misses the quintessential nature of prayer.

Don't get me wrong. I recognize the logical need to understand prayer. If we are to pray, we should know the meanings of the words. If prayer is composed of praise of God, thanksgiving and petitions, how can we appropriately participate if the words are unintelligible? Perhaps we should make a New Year's pledge to study prayer this coming year. If prayer requires knowing, aren't we compelled to seriously study the text – not once a year but in a consistent and conscientious way? I make such pledges often, but my lifestyle like yours prevents execution.

Consequently, the translation allows us some form of comprehension. But consider what it misses. The ritual of prayer is more than mere understanding. It is a "transcendental" blend of the rational and the spiritual. It is embodied and pious, hallowed and revered. Rituals often carry their own meaning through physical action itself. We are so enamoured of the cognitive that we often confuse understanding with experience. But the challenge of prayer goes far beyond the clarification of phrases. It involves performance: singing, swaying, sitting, standing, remembering, smiling, crying, moving and being moved. All our senses are committed – as we should be. Each utterance binds the individual to community, a community of those present and those who are not present. There is something awesome in using Hebrew. Reciting the phrases evokes centuries of ancestors and automatically links us to them.

I am not making the absurd claim that we do not have an obligation to understand the words. Nor am I opposed to the use of English. The sages stated in tractate Sofrim that it is appropriate to translate the prayers for those, such as women, who cannot understand them. I am appreciative of those wonderful men and women who translated and composed tekhinnes (petitional prayers) in Yiddish. Our heritage is richer for their efforts.

But I am proposing that we learn to use more Hebrew so that prayer will find its way into our hearts and spirits – our neshamah – as well as our minds.(I thank my parents for my competence in Hebrew.)

When we recreate prayer books without Hebrew, or stop challenging ourselves to work through the biblical, talmudic and medieval texts that constitute our prayer books, we lose out. We privilege only one part of our nature and lose a connection with our own religious perception, practice and history. If all we can do is recite prayers in English, we have lost the connective tissue of our heritage.

Taking chances with liberals

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

"Why do liberals hate Israel?" my Shabbat guest wanted to know. He was not a gung-ho neo-con, but a thoughtful young Israeli visiting for the summer. He comes from a modern Orthodox family (they love scotch and jazz) and is planning to enter a hesder program that combines yeshiva study with army service. He intends to volunteer for the paratroopers.

This question was posed to us because we are considered by most to be very small-l liberal regarding the Middle East. What could I say? The premise underlying his question is that Israel has been abandoned by western liberals, who have totally embraced the Palestinian version of history and recent events, and may oppose the very existence of a Jewish state.

I assured him I didn't think this was true. The answer, I said, was complicated and began with early, rosy and unrealistic expectations of Israel and the Jews, and more realistic assessments of Israel's accomplishments were possible, indeed evident, in many quarters in North America.

My Shabbat guest is not alone in feeling that Israel must look elsewhere than to western liberals for support in its struggles. And where are many looking? To the other extreme – to North American fundamentalist Christian groups that have embraced Israel and the Jewish people. Now this really scares me.

Recently, Vancouver was the scene of a rousing meeting that featured Bridges for Peace (BFP) leader Charles Wagner, who has lived in Israel for the past 26 years. I salute him for putting his body where his heart obviously lies. Still, I take little comfort from his enthusiasm and even less from his theology of the Jewish state.

The argument put forward by BFP and other fundamentalist Christians goes like this: the Bible – which he described (oh, dear) "as accurate as the morning newspaper" – clearly gives only the Jews, descended from Isaac, title to the Holy Land. All others are usurpers of this unique promise. There is no such thing as a Palestinian people; Arabs have no claim to land in the God-given territory between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River. Rather than respond to terrorism with more terrorism, they argue, Jews and Israelis condemn killers such as Baruch Goldstein, while Muslims celebrate them as martyrs.

Wagner had harsh words for Islam as a religion, but he said he sees the creation of Israel as a fulfillment of the biblical prophecy of the ingathering of the exiles, which, in evangelical fundamentalist circles, is regarded as a precursor to the second coming of the messiah.

Wagner's argument unsettles me for several reasons. First, it imprisons Jews in someone else's theology. We have barely extricated ourselves from the idea that Jews killed God (absolved of this by Vatican II) only to be caught up in another theory, this time of messianic expectations. The corollary to this "ingathering" is that Jews will convert once they see the "second coming" – or maybe just before, depending on your interpretation of Revelation. Can we not see that one theological prison is as bad as another? Suppose we don't gather in all the exiles, or the messiah does not show up next week, month or year. Will it then be our fault?

Second, I find it hard to welcome such unconditional love, if that is what is being offered, when it comes with such disdain for another sister religion, Islam. Misguided as its fanatics are, Islam is a religion that is open to other interpretations. One of the rules of interfaith dialogue is that you don't dis the other guy's religion. I find this as lacking in the fundamentalist interpretations of Islam as I do anti-Semitic interpretations of Judaism.

Wagner's visit was sponsored by the Jewish-Christian Friendship Circle, part of our local Israel Action Committee. There are some fundamentalist tenets that I cannot accept here at home, so why should I accept their support abroad?

I believe very strongly in making alliance with mainstream Christian denominations. We share a belief in democracy, personal freedom and social support networks. If they misread Israel, we can show them the truth. If we want to influence public policy, we must enlist mainstream denominations and, more importantly, political decision makers.

For that, I'll take my chances with liberals.

It's also a keychain

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

My wife and I have been struggling with household clutter since the day we moved into our house. I don't think either of us ever threw out a piece of paper or obsolete possession when we were single. I know we haven't since we've been married. (And we are now the proud parents of two pack-rat toddlers.)

Three years ago, we recognized the problem and decided to have a garage sale right away to help get rid of our retired briefcases, battered tea saucers, 12 dog-eared Robert Ludlum paperbacks and other assorted junk. True to our promise, we did have a garage sale – two weeks ago.

While searching through boxes, cupboards and closets, we stumbled across some of the hidden Judaica that's found in most Jewish homes. I'm not talking about kiddush cups, mezuzahs and other items of ritual and spiritual significance. I'm talking about the strange, kitschy, sometimes ugly stuff that leaves you wondering.

For example, we have an acrylic bottle opener with a poorly sketched vista of the Old City of Jerusalem encased within. In case you can't recognize the view while you're opening your Moosehead, the bottle opener is adorned by the words "Old City." A useless item, you say? Nonsense! It's also a keychain!

We also have a metal, wall-mounting keyholder that spells "Jerusalem." The horizontal word hangs from a tiny chain. Attached to the J, the R, the S, the L and the M are little hooks where you can hang your keys. (Why are there so many key-related Jerusalem tchatchkes? Perhaps because it's a gated city?)

We also have four coffee mugs that say "Happy Chanukah." It's a well-known fact that the real miracle of Chanukah was that the Maccabees only had enough coffee for one pot, but it lasted for eight days. And, according to some historical sources, the Hasmonean battle plans were designed over a latte.

I look at this stuff and I laugh. The bookends shaped like menorahs. The pencil holder with a picture of the kotel. Whose idea was this stuff? While perhaps I could be convinced that King David secretly wanted a fine hotel named after him, I'm having trouble believing that he dreamed of keyholders, bottle openers and shot glasses being designed to celebrate the Holy City. If that was the vision, then the Tower of David would have included a gift shop from day one.

But not all of the Jewish articles around our homes are destined for mockery and storage. In fact, it's important that each Jewish home have a variety of lovely items: kiddush cups, havdalah sets, chalah covers and others.

And the items should be beautiful. The book of Shmot tells us: "This is my God and I shall worship him with beauty." I'm no scholar, but I'm not aware of a passage that reads: "Thou shalt hang thy car keys on a Jerusalem keyholder," nor one that promises: "He who opens a brewski with an old city bottle opener shall have a place in the world to come."

Jews are advised to engage in hiddur mitzvah, the beautification of the commandment. In other words, it adds value to a mitzvah when the act and its tools are esthetically pleasing. A beautiful kiddush cup and candle holder enhance Shabbat. A striking seder plate beautifies Pesach. A shiny, creative menorah can add an additional spark to Chanukah candlelighting.

In my view, Sukkot allows us to engage in hiddur mitzvah in a way that no other holiday can. The fresh lulav and aromatic etrog bring pleasant smells and greenery to Sukkot. The bare walls of the sukkah are decorated lovingly by children. And as an autumnal harvest celebration, the holiday itself symbolizes a type of beautification of the world – a time when the leaves burst into a symphony of colours, a time to appreciate – and be a part of – beauty and simplicity.

May you have a beautiful Sukkot.

The Kirshner File

The Yom Kippur War, 30 years later

Something seemed amiss on that pleasantly warm evening in Jaffa on Friday, Oct. 5, 1973. One after another, friends who had been invited to my post-Yom Kippur farewell party on Oct. 6 phoned to cancel, saying they or their husbands had suddenly been called up for military duty. My bride of a year, Etti, wondered what was happening. Was a crisis brewing in the Middle East? We went for a stroll on Jerusalem Boulevard, which cuts through Jaffa. As we walked, we saw Israeli army vehicles racing up and down that tree-shaded thoroughfare. Very unusual, we thought.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Early the next morning, we were awakened by the roar of aircraft. I rushed to the balcony and saw two Mirage jets streaking across the sunny sky. Etti, an Israeli who had lived through the anxiety and joy of the Six Day War, said, "It's war." I was shocked by the finality of her observation, though I knew that the situation in the Middle East had recently been tense. In September, the Israeli Air Force had shot down 13 Syrian MIGs in a swirling dogfight over the Mediterranean Sea. We wandered into old Jaffa. By the minute, the roads swelled with military traffic. There was a mood of urgency in the air. Now I feared the worst. Back home, we tuned in to Kol Israel's two o'clock news broadcast. What we heard crushed us: Egypt and Syria had attacked Israeli positions in the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights. Israel had launched counter-attacks. The Yom Kippur War had begun.

At that moment, when sirens in Tel Aviv wailed, I decided to postpone my departure to Canada. In Israel's hour of duress, I would remain in Jaffa. Having arrived in Israel as a temporary resident in 1971, I had been scheduled to leave Tel Aviv on Oct. 9.

Little did we know that Egypt and Syria, which had lost territory in the 1967 Six Day War, had been preparing for war for the past 10 months. Israel had received warnings from several sources, including King Hussein of Jordan, that Anwar Sadat and Hafez Assad were gearing up for an offensive.

Israel had factored in the possibility that Egypt and Syria would try to regain the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights. But Israel had concluded they would not be ready to attack until the mid-1970s. In any case, Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Dayan believed that Egypt, which had fought the War of Attrition with Israel from 1967 to 1970 along the Suez Canal, was simply incapable of neutralizing the Israeli Air Force, which could block an Egyptian reconquest of the Sinai.

Israel's attitude, a mix of complacency and arrogance, may have been due to Egyptian bluster. Since 1971, Sadat had been threatening to wrest the Sinai back from Israel. In May 1973, Israel had girded itself for an Egyptian offensive that never materialized. Still, Israel's chief of staff, Gen. David Elazar, had ordered a partial mobilization. Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir took that incident into account when she learned that the families of Soviet advisors in Cairo and Damascus had been evacuated, and that the Egyptian army near the canal had reached a high degree of preparedness. In the runup to these ominous developments, Israel was preoccupied by a diversion in Austria in which Palestinian gunmen had commandeered a train carrying Russian Jews from Moscow.

On Oct. 5, the evening my friends called to cancel their appearances at my party, Elazar came into possession of alarming data that suggested that Egypt and Syria were poised to strike Israel. He asked the cabinet for permission to mount a pre-emptive air attack against Syria and to order a general mobilization. Dayan and Meir demurred, but permitted the call-up of 100,000 reservists, according to Chaim Herzog in The Arab-Israeli Wars (1982). In the early hours of Oct. 6, the chief of Israeli military intelligence, Gen. Eli Zeira, informed Dayan and Elazar that war would break out that day on both fronts.

By consensus, Egypt and Syria initiated hostilities to seize the Sinai and the Golan and to force an internationally imposed diplomatic settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute. Sadat had offered Meir a package deal to defuse the conflict, but she had rejected it.

Sadat chose Oct. 6 to launch Operation Badr for two reasons: Israel's defences on Yom Kippur would supposedly be at a low ebb, and it coincided with advantageous tides and currents in the canal. Egypt's armed forces, commanded by Gen. Ahmed Ismail Ali, struck hard. Two thousand guns opened fire as waves of aircraft bombed airfields, bases, radar stations, artillery sites, missile emplacements, fortifications and observation posts along the Bar-Lev Line, which ran the length of the canal. Having softened up the Israelis, 8,000 infantrymen stormed across the canal. Facing this onslaught was a small Israeli force that had only recently been reinforced.

On the northern front, the Syrian army, under the command of Gen. Yussef Chakkour, unleashed a force of 1,500 tanks, supported by 1,000 artillery pieces and MIGs. The Syrians were met by a smallish Israeli garrison that could field approximately 170 tanks.

In Sinai, on Oct. 8, Israel launched a counter-attack. At a press conference in Tel Aviv, Elazar exuded confidence: "We will break their bones." Israel's riposte was remarkably unsuccessful. Firing shoulder-mounted Sagger missiles, Egyptian troops decimated Israeli tank columns. Egyptian ground-to-air missiles downed many Israeli Phantoms, Skyhawks and Mirages.

On the Golan, the Syrians advanced like a juggernaut. Syria captured Israeli army headquarters in Nafek, overran the settlement of Ramat Magshimim, pushed toward the escarpment overlooking the Sea of Galilee and took an important position on Mount Hermon. My cousin, Yaacov (Yanky), a Skyhawk pilot, was shot down by a SAM missile in the first desperate moments of the war. He was rescued after bailing out of his burning plane. Several days later, his left hand swaddled in a bandage, he married his high school sweetheart, Amira, in a poignant ceremony in Haifa. Shortly afterward, he returned to battle, no worse for wear.

The first week of the war went badly for Israel, and at one point, Dayan despaired that the "Third Temple," an oblique reference to Israel, was in danger of falling. Fighting tenaciously in Sinai, Israel decisively defeated the Egyptians in a massive tank battle – one of the largest in history – on Oct. 14.

Gen. David Elazar

Egypt had launched the attack at Syria's behest. The Syrians had been under great Israeli pressure. On Oct. 9, after Israeli settlements in the Galilee were hit by Syrian missiles, Israel bombed strategic targets inside Syria. They included the ministry of defence in Damascus. By accident, Israel struck the Soviet cultural centre in the Syrian capital. During a visit to Damascus in 1975, I caught a glimpse of the ruined Soviet facility.

Having more or less beaten back the Syrians on the Golan, Israel arranged bus tours to the Golan battlefields for reporters. After a briefing at Kibbutz Ginossar, our bus made its way up the steep road to the Golan. Looking out the window, I saw formations of Israeli jets sweeping across the Sea of Galilee and was jolted when an artillery shell exploded not even 100 metres away. The bus stopped at El Al, the Syrians' furthest point of penetration. I was shocked by the grim sight. The pebbled field was strewn with the burnt, bloated corpses of Syrian soldiers, some in grotesque shapes.

Having regained the initiative in the Sinai, Israeli troops, commanded by Gen. Ariel Sharon, stormed across the canal into Africa, thereby cutting off Egypt's Third Army. It was a turning point in the war, but Israel sustained serious casualties in fierce fighting at the "Chinese Farm." Hostilities on the Egyptian front ended on Oct. 24, after Israel's capture of Suez and compliance with a United Nations truce.

On the Golan, the tide of war shifted in Israel's favour. Israel drove back the Syrians and inflicted blows on a Jordanian armoured brigade and an Iraqi tank division. Israel also recaptured Mount Hermon. Syria agreed to a truce with Israel on Oct. 22, but a war of attrition, lasting until the spring of 1974, ensued on the Golan.

Far out in the Mediterranean Sea, Israel engaged Syria and Egypt in the world's first missile battles on the high seas. Israel gained the upper hand in these historic encounters.

In the midst of the war, the United States replenished Israel with planes, tanks, armoured vehicles and munitions. From a sidewalk on Allenby Street in Tel Aviv on Oct. 14, I looked up at the cloudless sky and saw mammoth U.S. Hercules aircraft ferrying in supplies. It was an exhilarating moment I will never forget.

The war, which caught Israel almost by surprise, was an intelligence failure for which Israel paid dearly. Israel eventually regained its footing, but it is debatable whether Israel scored an outright victory. Some commentators claim it ended in stalemate, particularly on the Egyptian front. Observers concur that Egypt and Syria fought better than in the Six Day War.

Extremely costly in terms of Israeli lives lost (more than 2,500 soldiers were killed), the war was a watershed. It shattered the political status quo, enhanced the role of the United States in Mideast diplomacy, prompted Egypt to sign a peace treaty with Israel, led to Egypt's rapprochement with the United States, ruined the careers of Meir and Elazar (who died prematurely) and brought Yitzhak Rabin, the former chief of staff and ambassador to the United States, to the fore of Israeli politics. Thirty years on, the war still reverberates.

Adath Israel welcomes new associate rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As part of his previous job as Rav Hamachsher (supervisor of kashrut) for the Philadelphia branch of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, the new associate rabbi of Adath Israel Congregation oversaw four Chinese vegetarian restaurants, three of which were in Chinatown.

"It was lots of fun," Rabbi David Seed recalled in his new office in Adath Israel, where he became associate rabbi in August. Now, he says, he is looking forward to new challenges, particularly given the size of the 1,800-family congregation in North York.

"I saw this as a wonderful opportunity," said Rabbi Seed, who spent the last eight years as spiritual leader of Congregation Beth El in Yardley, Pa., a synagogue with about 250 families. He joins Adath Israel's senior rabbi, Rabbi Steven Saltzman and rabbi emeritus, Rabbi Erwin Schild, who have not had an associate rabbi for six years.

Rabbi David Seed

Pastoral duties are only one aspect of Rabbi Seed's work. He will also be focusing on youth and young families.

"[There are] all sorts of opportunities that haven't been able to be addressed because there hasn't been the staff," said the rabbi. "It's a challenge, but it's also very exciting to address a lot of these needs."

He hopes to fill one niche by creating a program for expectant parents. "It's a nice opportunity for people going through the same stuff in their life to connect with one another."

Rabbi Seed also hopes to connect members by inaugurating a chavurah program of small, informal study groups.

On a personal level, he is enthused about Adath Israel's central location in the Jewish community. In Philadelphia, he said, the community is very spread out, translating into long commutes – from 20 minutes up to two hours one way – for his three children to get to school and for him to go to local rabbinic meetings. "Here, things are much more accessible. It's a whole new life for us."

And, even though Toronto is only a 10-hour drive from Philadelphia, it's "still a new country with new customs, new words and new rituals," he said, noting that he recently saw the roof at Skydome open and close at a Blue Jays game.

A 46-year-old native of New London, Conn., Rabbi Seed was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in 1983 and graduated the following year with a master's degree in social work. Prior to that, he received a bachelor's degree in Jewish history from JTS and a bachelor's degree in political science from Columbia University.

Although he started out working for the Jewish federation in Atlanta, he has spent all but the first two years of his career in congregations, first as an assistant rabbi in Cleveland and then Milwaukee, before moving to Philadelphia.

Rabbi Seed says he comes from "a typical American Conservative family." His mother, a schoolteacher, and father, a pharmacist, attended synagogue "somewhat regularly," although they were not shomer Shabbat.

A former Camp Ramah camper and staff member, the rabbi worked for USY on Wheels, a summer travel program affiliated with the Conservative movement's youth arm, United Synagogue Youth. His wife Lori, who earned her master's degrees in Judaica and social work at JTS and Columbia, also worked for the program and, more recently, taught cooking at Philadelphia's Ramah Day Camp.

Rabbi Seed credits Ramah for his involvement in religious life. "It was the first place I saw what it was like to experience Judaism and Shabbat in that kind of setting, where Judaism was really a daily part of your life, not something you'd make a special effort to participate in. I found it very appealing."

One of the reasons he became a rabbi, he said, was to share his Jewish knowledge and love of Judaism the way his mentors at Ramah and religious school did with him.

TERRY FOX RUN: On the afternoon of Sept. 25, more than 200 Grade 5 students from Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin and Posluns campuses converged at Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill, where they walked approximately 25 laps around the track in support of the annual Terry Fox Run. This is the 12th year the school has participated. The students expect to raise more than $15,000.

Zareinu provides a high school for girls

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

During the summer, Guitti Perman, 13, was a little nervous about going back to school.

"I'm going to be in school from 9 o'clock until 5:20, and my classes will include Hebrew, English, math, Chumash and the parshah of the week," Guitti said.

For most children attending Jewish day school, this statement would be part of a simple end-of-summer conversation. But for Guitti, verbal exchanges are an achievement. Guitti has cerebral palsy, a condition that affects body movement, speech and co-ordination.

Guitti Perman

An inability to effectively control her body's actions efficiently and problems with speech have meant Guitti has had to struggle at every stage of her development. Learning to walk and talk have been momentous achievements for the young member of the Lubavitch community.

In June, the teen graduated from elementary school, and in September, she and three other girls began to attend classes at the new Zareinu High School, located at Beth Jacob High School.

Guitti attended Zareinu Educational Centre for nursery and kindergarten until she was six years old. However, lack of a peer group prompted her parents to have her attend the Hugh MacMillan Rehabilitation Centre and then a special needs program in a public school, for a short time.

Guitti may not always have been easy to understand, "but she's definitely vocal," her mother Chaya Perman said. When she was in public school, Guitti made it clear that she wasn't comfortable in that environment.

"She wanted to be like her seven siblings, including her twin sister, in a school where she would learn about her own community."

When the Permans found out that there was a group forming at Zareinu that was age- and cognitive-appropriate, they re-enrolled Guitti in the Zareinu elementary school program.

"She became a changed child when she moved there," Perman said. "It's good for her self-esteem and confidence."

At Zareinu Educational Centre, Guitti participated in the Dynamic Method of Kinetic Stimulation (MEDEK), a type of physiotherapy used to strengthen gross motor skills in babies and children who have movement disorders that result from neurological dysfunction.

Perman believes MEDEK helped Guitti reach a level of achievement that would not have otherwise been possible.

As a baby, Guitti was treated by Chilean physical therapist, Ramon Cuevas in Caracas, Venezuela. The family moved to Toronto to continue the treatment with Esther Fink, who heads the program at Zareinu. Guitti's father, Rabbi Moshe Perman, remained in Caracas where he works in the Lubavitch community. He travels back and forth to Toronto.

Guitti usually accompanies her mother to their neighbourhood Chabad synagogue on Saturdays. "She learned to daven at school," Chaya Perman said.

In addition to Hebrew studies, Guitti has speech and occupational therapy integrated into her daily curriculum. Emotional support is also offered to families coming to terms with caring for a child with special needs.

As Guitti enters her adolescent life and begins to have a greater understanding of self, it's important to have professionals help her cope with her differences, her mother said.

Eventually, Zareinu is planning to provide a physical location for high school boys, said Randy Spiegel, executive director of the school.

In the meantime, the boys go to other schools. Spiegel hopes that by September 2004-05, another Zareinu facility will be available elsewhere in the community.

Zareinu currently has 70 full- and part-time children enrolled at its Bathurst Street location and many others participate in their outreach programs. Spiegel said there are about 130 children in the Jewish community who could benefit from in-house programs and another 300 from Zareinu's outreach services.

"The direct cost of therapeutic and educational services is $25,000. However, the school charges $16,750 for a full-time child," Spiegel said, adding that the difference comes from the money raised through fundraising, UJA Federation funds and Community Care Access Centre (CCAC) money.

"We're pleased with the relationship between the school and the York Region CCACs," Speigel said.

Shaking the lulav in appreciation

By RABBI
REUVEN TRADBURKS

Rabbinic Reflections

The scene in synagogues on Sukkot, with lulavs shaking all over, is colourful to say the least. It's even sometimes comical. The lulav is not meant to be used as a spear, but you have to keep your wits about you to prevent yourself from getting a sharp tip in the back of the head – or worse.

The essential mitzvah of Sukkot is to pick up a lulav along with the etrog and hadassim and aravot, the four species. Once we have them in our hands, holding them all together in the manner in which they grow, we have fulfilled the mitzvah – even without shaking the lulav. However, some believe shaking the lulav, not just picking it up, is itself a mitzvah – an enhanced mitzvah.

In addition to simply shaking the lulav, we actually incorporate the shaking into the Hallel at different spots during the prayer.

When we shake the lulav – a colourful and fruitful example of the goodness we have – during the Hallel – a full-voiced song of thanks to HaShem for all the good and joy we have – we join the song with the object, both of which communicate joy, simchah and thanks.

We shake the lulav when we say the following verse from Hodu: "Give thanks to HaShem for He is good, His kindness is forever." It is a positive, thankful verse, so it makes sense to combine the joyful symbol of the lulav with it.

But then we shake the lulav at the end of Hallel in a verse that actually doesn't seem to fit the theme of Hallel at all: "Ana HaShem" – "Please Hashem, save us." We actually shake it twice, because the verse is repeated. And it is not a happy or songful verse. It is desperate, pleading with God to help us through our difficulties. It seems to belong more to Yom Kippur than to a yom tov. Certainly it is not a verse in which to shake the lulav, the symbol of thanks for what we have, given that it is asking for what we don't have.

So why do we do shake the lulav then?

Hallel communicates joy, not utopia. We can have joy and be thankful for our bounty while being aware there is much we lack. We can be thankful for what we have, while wanting what we don't have. In fact, maybe our appreciation for what we have grows when we realize what we don't have. And truthfully, are we not always in a state of wanting?

The lulav symbolizes the joy in what we have, so we shake it in the joyful verse – "Thank HaShem for He is Good" – and we shake it again in the pleading verse – "Please HaShem, save us." Perhaps we even shake it a little harder for the joy of what we have, recognizing what we lack. We don't need utopia to be thankful. We can still lack and be thankful.

Chag Sameach.

Outraged by Muslim distortions

The Trouble With Islam: A Wake-Up Call for Honesty and Change*, by Irshad Manji, Random House, $22.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This is an explosive book – an outspoken condemnation of Islamic fundamentalism and its mistreatment of women, its derogation of Jews, its unwillingness to come to terms with modernity. Timely, passionately argued, outspoken and courageous, it has quickly become a bestseller. Undoubtedly, many readers recall when Salman Rushdie became the subject of an edict ordering his death after his novel The Satanic Verses was viewed as heretical to Islam.

Manji is angry. "Pick a Muslim country, any Muslim country, and the most brutal humiliations will grab you by the vitals. In Pakistan, an average of two women every day die from 'honour killings,' often with Allah's names on the lips of the murderers. In Malaysia, a Muslim woman can't travel without the consent of a man. In Mali and Mauritania, little boys are seduced into slavery by Muslim hustlers. In Sudan, slavery happens at the hands of Islamic militias. In Yemen and Jordan, Christian humanitarian workers have been shot point-blank. In Bangladesh, artists who advocate for the rights of religious minorities have been locked up or driven out of the country altogether. It's all documented."

Manji encountered virulent anti-Semitism at the religious Muslim school she attended in British Columbia, where her parents had immigrated from Uganda. In The Trouble With Islam, she wonders if many Muslims know the degree to which Islam is a "gift of the Jews." Ideas such as the unity of God's creation, humans' innate capacity as God's creatures to choose good, the purposefulness of our earthly lives, the infinity of the afterlife – these and other blessings of monotheism came to Muslims via Judaism.

"This discovery blew my brain because it suggested that Muslims need not be steeped in anti-Semitism. If anything, we have reason to be grateful rather than hateful to Jews."

Where the state of Israel is concerned, Manji is filled with praise. Israel, she says, brings more compassion to colonization than its adversaries have ever brought to liberation.

About the war of 1948, she makes clear that Palestinians left of their own accord, fully expecting to return once the Jews had been driven into the sea. On the other hand, she says the hundreds of thousands of Jews who were expelled from Arab lands didn't languish in refugee camps because Israel absorbed and integrated the vast majority of them. She also indicates that Israel has granted citizenship to 98,000 Palestinians under a family reunification effort. "What have Arab governments by and large done for Palestinians?"

Manji points out that Israel is the only country in the Middle East to which Arab Christians are voluntarily migrating. There they thrive, achieving much higher university rates than the Arab Muslim citizens of Israel and enjoying better overall health than Jews themselves.

Manji opposes the idea of taking multiculturalism to the extreme. She wonders why forced clitorectomy shouldn't be abolished. She asks why a father or mother would threaten death to a daughter who chooses to marry outside the religion. And why should a Muslim cabbie who rapes a mentally disabled woman get off under the rubric of cultural sensitivity?

She is outraged that "too many Arab Muslim intellectuals, journalists and politicians tell their audiences that Jews are Nazis because they siphon the blood of non-Jewish children for religious observances. Known as the blood libel, this fiction was itself a favourite calumny against Jews in the Nazi publication Der Sturmer."

She notes another, almost insane, calumny: an Israeli project to share farming technology with Egypt was reported in the Egyptian press as a plot to hand toxic seeds and carcinogenic cucumbers to unsuspecting farmers. The Israelis were also accused of selling chewing gum that threw ladies into spasms of lust and genetically modified their husbands' sperm. She writes, "All of this from a 'moderate' Arab country that has had a peace treaty with Israel since 1979!"

The Trouble With Islam is a courageous call to Muslims in the West to use their precious freedoms to move out of mind-numbing rigidity. Manji offers a practical program for empowering women in the Islamic world, for sprouting a pluralism of ideas and for promoting respect for religious minorities.

Manji, who is a TV personality, feminist, lesbian and media entrepreneur, calls herself a Muslim Refusenik, a person who "refuses to join an army of automatons in the name of Allah."

What does hudna really mean?

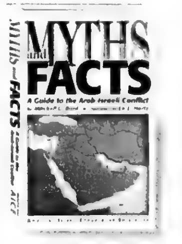
MYTH:

Palestinian terrorist groups agreed to a ceasefire to advance the Middle East peace process envisioned by the road map peace plan.

FACT:

This past June, Islamic Jihad and Hamas agreed to a hudna in response to demands from then-Palestinian Authority prime minister Mahmoud Abbas to stop their attacks on Israel so he could fulfil his obligations under the road map peace plan. The agreement was interpreted in the western media as the declaration of a ceasefire, which was hailed as a step forward in the peace process. While any cessation of violence against Israeli civilians is to be welcomed, it is important to understand that what the terrorist groups agreed to is very different in the Muslim context than the benign way it has been portrayed.



The media and some political leaders portray a hudna as a truce or a ceasefire designed to bring peace. Though the term hudna does refer to a temporary cession of hostilities, the cessation can be used to regroup, gain strength and trick an enemy into lowering its guard. The term comes from the well-known story of the Muslim conquest of Mecca. Instead of a rapid victory, Muhammad made a 10-year treaty with the Kuraysh tribe. In 628 AD, after only two years of the treaty, Muhammad and his forces concluded that the Kuraysh were too weak to resist. The Muslims broke the treaty and took over all of Mecca without opposition.

The current hudna with Islamic terrorist organizations is no different. Hamas has used the tactic to gain military advantage no fewer than 10 times in 10 years (Washington Institute for Near East Policy, June 2). The Hamas charter openly rejects the notion of a peaceful solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, and the group has given no indication it has changed its views. On the contrary, Hamas spokespeople have been quoted in news reports as saying they will not give up their weapons, that they will continue to resist "illegal occupation," and that they believe the "violent awakenening from a few weeks or months of quiet" will "reaffirm Palestinians' belief in the intifadah as the only option for them." Even the hudna declaration itself asserted "the legitimate right to resist the occupation as a strategic option until the end of the Zionist occupation of our homeland and until we achieve all our national rights." Hamas contends that all of Israel is occupied territory. This is why U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell called Hamas an "enemy of peace" just before the hudna was declared, and said "the entire international community must speak out strongly against the activities of Hamas."

Not all Palestinian terror groups agreed to the hudna, and violence continued after the supposed ceasefire. Israeli intelligence found evidence the Palestinians were exploiting the ceasefire to reorganize their forces. They recruited suicide bombers, increased the rate of production of Qassam rockets and sought to extend their range.

The road map explicitly calls on the Palestinian leadership to do more than just achieve a cessation of hostilities. They are obligated to disarm and dismantle terrorists and the terrorist infrastructure.

Sukkot sites for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: How do you make a lulav shake? Answer: Take three scoops of mint chocolate chip ice cream, add milk and blend. Pour into a tall glass and garnish with a stalk of celery and a wedge of lemon. That's how to make a Lulav Shake! [http://makeashorterlink.com/?F3A1656F5]

The Jewish Highway

OK, now that I've got your attention, let's look at some Sukkot sites for kids.

First about the holiday itself. Children can learn about the holiday (and how to really make their lulav shake) at several sites written just for them, such as Virtual Jerusalem Holidays [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/sukkot/kids.htm] and TorahTots. [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/sukkot/sukkot.htm] Teachers will appreciate the holiday backgrounders and activities provided by the Jewish Agency for Israel. [http://www.jafi.org.il/education/festivls]

Once you know it all, match your wits against the Sukkot IQ quiz. This clever test doesn't wait until you've completed all 16 questions to tell you how you're doing. It praises when you choose correctly and seems to take just a bit too much pleasure taunting you when you slip up. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?G13B22AF5]

If your kids have access to a sukkah, here are some decorating ideas for them.. Instead of stringing up yet another paper chain, follow the instructions at VJ Holidays to create a harvest-time "food chain" by using cranberries, crabapples, popcorn, peppers, onions and small eggplants. [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/sukkot/decor.htm] The Shema Yisrael Torah Network has Sukkot-related drawings pages that can be printed out and coloured in. These are traditional pictures showing the construction of a sukkah and men and boys shaking the lulav and etrog. [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/yomtov/sukkot/skpages.htm] You can download a page from the Jewish Theological Seminary's Kids' Corner site where you'll find a young woman shaking her lulav. [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/egalpos/imgthree.shtml]

How many board games have you ever played that call for "a die, a copy of a Jewish Bible and access to your pantry"? That's what you'll need to play the ingenious Kitchen Table Harvest Game that you can print out and play in your sukkah. This game has spaces on its board that refer to verses in the Tanach where foods are mentioned. For example, if you happen to land on the square that says "Proverbs 15:17," look up the verse and you'll find the quotation, "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith." Then go into your kitchen to look for some herbs (or if applicable, an ox). The first person to collect 10 food items is the winner. [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/sukkot/]

Is there someone you'd like to get in touch with this holiday, but you have left it to the last minute? That's no problem if you send them a holiday e-card. Choose from a selection of eight different online cards that you can personalize with your own message. Your e-card can even include Sukkot-appropriate songs such as Ma Tovu (How Goodly are Thy Tents) and Shibolet Basadeh (The Sheaf in the Field). [http://www.holidays.net/sukkot/cards.htm] (Although I liked this site, it seemed to spawn a lot of pop-up ads on my browser. If that annoys you, stay away.)

It might be a few years before your kids are ready to build their own real sukkah, but in the meanwhile, there are plenty of miniatures that they can tackle crafted from shoe boxes [http://makeashorterlink.com/?O53E23AF5] or Popsicle sticks. [http://www.geocities.com/amynealw/sukkot.htm]

But if you are going to put all that time and effort into making a sukkah, why not follow the lead of the kids at the Hebrew Academy of Tidewater in Virginia Beach, Va.? Make it an edible sukkah. With building materials like graham cracker walls, a pretzel-stick roof and cereal decorations, who could go wrong? [http://www.chadiscrafts.com/fun/ediblesukkah.html]

The fourth grade kids at Stamford, Conn.'s bi-cultural day school took up the edible sukkah challenge and created an even stranger array of structures that you can browse through at their site and use as your own inspiration. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?J28D32AF5] Scroll down their page to find a question that I presume has been perplexing rabbis for millennia: "I wonder what blessing you say on eating a sukkah."

Have a very happy holiday.

Reena program helps develop staff for agency

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Alana Starr, 19, says for the first time in her life, she's excited to wake up at 7:30 a.m.

Starr is participating in Reena Foundation's first Learn and Earn program, a 15-week course that provides participants with six weeks of instruction and nine weeks of placement – six weeks of which are paid – in a Reena facility.

Joe Persaud, supervisor of training and development at Reena, said the program was conceived as a way to create staff for the agency, which is dedicated to integrating adults with developmental disabilities into society.

At the end of the 15-week period, successful participants are guaranteed an interview for a part-time position at Reena, Persaud said.

"If they want to continue their studies in the developmental field, they can do so while working for us, and after six months of part-time work, they can apply for a full-time position at Reena."

Most of the courses are taught by internal instructors and include medical pharmacology, life planning, first aid, CPR and crisis prevention.

Outside specialists teach such courses as behaviour management and back care, which is necessary for lifting and transferring patients, he said.

Starr said she realized she wanted to work in the developmental field after completing a high school co-op placement in an elementary school classroom for students with special needs.

"The kids loved the attention I gave them; it opened my eyes," says Starr, who plans eventually to get a teaching degree and teach students with special needs.

The Reena program is in a classroom setting, she said, but the students are immersed in the agency. "The clients come in and visit us and we get to know them."

The 17 students in the current group range in age from 19 to their mid-50s, and come from all walks of life. "We are all so committed to the course that someone takes a two-hour bus ride to get here. I certainly have never been happy to wake up at 7:30 a.m., but I can't wait to get in."

Persaud said they plan on running another course in the spring, and it is available upon interview to anyone interested in working in the developmental field but does not have the appropriate training.

For more information, call Persaud or Fiona Ott at 905-889-6484.

Buy Israeli ... in Israel

Wherever you live, making a commitment to purchase products from Israel is a powerful and practical way to strengthen the country during tough times. But Israel reaps the biggest benefit when you buy Israeli in Israel itself. There's a vast catalogue of quality products and endless opportunity for shopping adventure:

MARKETS – If you thrive on noise, negotiation and a dazzling array of products, head directly for the shuk. For food, the Carmel market in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda are can't miss experiences and for a more complete line of items, take in Be'ersheva's Bedouin market on Thursdays.

INDOOR MALLS - When it comes to Middle East shopping landmarks, Israel houses the mall of them all – Jerusalem's Malcha Mall – the largest in the region. But Israeli malls lure shoppers in every corner of the country. Among the more notable are Tel Aviv's Azrieli Mall inside the Azrieli Centre – Israel's tallest building - built by Canadian David Azrieli; the exclusive Gan Ha'ir (City Garden Shopping Centre), also in Tel Aviv and Haifa's three major malls – the Panorama Centre, Migdal Hanevi'im and the Chorev Centre.

ON THE STREET– For many visitors to Israel, nothing surpasses the flavour and vitality of outdoor shopping. Check out the friendly pedestrian mall in picturesque Zichron Ya'akov, just south of Haifa or in Rishon Le Tzion. Both cities are famous for their historic wineries. Then venture as far north as you can go for Metulla's outdoor bargains. On your way back south, check out the antiques on Haifa's Massada Street. And don't forget to bargain. It's expected.

ARTISTS QUARTERS – High quality artwork is a staple of most Israel shopping tours. The artists' quarter in Tzfat (Safed) is enveloped in the city's mystical history. There's a thriving artists' district in Tel Aviv's sister city of Jaffa and an entire village for artists in Ein Hod, near Haifa.

One final tip, there's an 18% Value Added Tax (VAT) on most purchases, which will be refunded at the airport before you leave the country as long as your purchase and an invoice are packed in a transparent sealed bag.

Despair and hope work hand-in-hand in Kishinev

Toronto's Jewish community is involved in a new initiative to revitalize the Jewish community of Kishinev - capital of the republic of Moldova, formerly known as Bessarabia, part of the former Soviet Union – a community that has struggled through anti-Semitic pogroms and abject poverty for decades.

UJA Federation will be asked to assist the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) in its efforts to raise the funds needed to create a dynamic new Jewish campus in Kishinev featuring a $2 million (U.S.) Jewish community centre complete with educational, cultural, and health facilities.

"There was an old synagogue in Kishinev, which for years was being used as nothing more than a car repair shop," says Gerry Goldenberg, a participant on a recent UJA Federation fact-finding mission to Kishinev. "Now, the JDC has bought back the shul and is going to rebuild it as a new Jewish community centre complete with educational, health and fitness facilities. It will be a great place to rebuild the minds and bodies of Kishinev's Jews."

"The Jews have always suffered there," says mission participant, Mendy Sharf. "If you went back in time to 1880, the buildings would look the same as they do today. The JDC is trying to reach the children, to educate them, to make them optimistic about life as a Jew. This new Jewish campus is an essential ingredient in doing just that."

"It was such an incredibly powerful experience, being in Kishinev, especially in light of its amazing history," says Allan Brown, who chaired the mission. "We saw elderly Jewish people living on as little as a $14 a month government pension, and the buildings were in terrible shape, and yet, there is hope. That is why we went – to see how we could assist them in revitalizing their Jewish community. Despair and hope work hand-in-hand in a place like Kishinev. This new Jewish campus will reawaken the dormant Jewish spirit that exists there."

In the 18th century, Kishinev's story was very different when it was a flourishing Jewish center. By the turn of the century, Jews owned a score of factories employing thousands of Jewish workers; there were 16 Jewish schools with 2,100 students; and 70 synagogues.

However, things changed drastically in 1903 when, on Easter Day, 49 of its Jews were massacred by frenzied mobs. Hundreds more were seriously injured; thousands were left homeless and property damage was measured in millions of gold rubles. In 1905 a second pogrom claimed the lives of another 19 Jews. All the while, government endorsed anti-Semitic propaganda fanned the flames of this ongoing anti-Jewish hatred.

The devastation of the Jewish community of Kishinev was completed by the Nazis and their Moldavian cohorts who, together, annihilated 53,000 of the 65,000 Jewish inhabitants of the city.

Communism brought ever more difficult restrictions to the remaining Jews: in 1961 - bar mitzvahs were forbidden; in 1964, all synagogues were closed, except one - the one which is used today; Jews were harassed and imprisoned on false charges.

A resident of Kishinev stands in front of a memorial to the Jews killed in the 1903 pogrom.

"I never imagined that there were any Jews in the world who could live in such poverty," says Harry Gorman, another mission participant. "I asked some of the families I met why they didn't just move to Israel. Many of them are frail and unwilling to travel, some are even afraid of living in Israel. As bad as the situation is for these people, without the JDC and the Jewish Agency (UJA Federation's overseas partners) they'd have absolutely nothing. This new community centre is a start. Hopefully, it will lead to a much brighter future."

Backing Israel is everyone's responsibility

"The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing." - Edmund Burke

Mark Waldman

COMMENTARY
By MARK WALDMAN

We live in a very confusing and unsettling time. Although we have lived through an era when Jews stood out for their enormous contributions to society, broke barriers and experienced unprecedented equality, we are now starting to see levels of anti-Semitism rise around the world. However, it is a disguised anti-Semitism in the form of anti-Zionism. It may not be fashionable to hate Jews, but it is acceptable to hate Israel and everything associated with it. Of no coincidence is the fact that Israel is very vulnerable today, both economically and physically. The grim reality is that we Jews and our Jewish homeland, Israel, are a small minority in a world that does not seem to distinguish between good and bad or right and wrong.

Education is a priority

We live in a world where, as proven by Goebbels, the Nazi propagandist himself: "If you tell a lie enough times, it becomes accepted as truth, and, the bigger the lie, the more likely it is to be accepted." This is the philosophy to which our opponents adhere. There are few nations and people we can count on, so we must count on ourselves. Fortunately, things are not all bad. We do have some friends out there such as the Americans and certain segments of our society. The challenge is to educate those around us. A poll recently conducted by the Canada Israel Committee (CIC) found that 63% of Canadians are not very familiar with the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians. A further 58% do not believe - or are unsure as to whether Israel is a democracy. It should come as no surprise then that 83% of Canadians think that our government should remain neutral in the conflict. We must never lose sight of the fact that our opponents dwarf us in numbers and in their passion and conviction.

The battle is ours

Israel may be stronger militarily than the Palestinians, but there is another war being fought and that is the media war in the court of public opinion. A recent poll in The Globe and Mail asked who would be responsible if the Road Map failed. 65% of the respondents blamed Israel. What was interesting about the results was that over 33,000 people responded in less than 24 hours, more than twice the average number for Globe online polls. Clearly, our opponents did a much better job of mobilizing votes. We need to work smarter and harder than our opponents and we need to gain a renewed sense of conviction if we are to have a fighting chance. Many of us are critical of Israel's poor image in the media, or the lack of support from our government on issues that matter most to us. We traditionally look to the community advocacy organizations to fight our battles for us and, if they fail, we blame them. It is time to stop that game and to take responsibility for our collective well-being. Each of us has a voice and we must use it.

Israel is a personal priority

If I had to guess what I would be doing with my life when I was in university, doing work on behalf of the Jewish community would not even be on the list. Over time I got involved with UJA Federation, which rewarded me by providing greater roles of responsibility. I was afforded several opportunities to go on some great missions to Israel. I also started reading about the history of anti-Semitism and then it finally sunk in one day. I came to the realization that ours is the most privileged generation of Jews to ever live and yet my generation was taking for granted so much of the rich heritage for which our ancestors struggled and even died. We must be active in protecting the Jewish identity that we have been given. I knew that we could not simply expect others to stand up if we weren't willing to do so ourselves. It must always start with yourself. So I put my business career on hold and decided to take on as many projects as possible to benefit the local community and the State of Israel. I am privileged to work with some very committed volunteers, philanthropists and leaders from North America, Europe and Israel. I have learned a lot from these great individuals about how the American Jewish Community has achieved so much and how we can do the same here.

Take the first step

Part of the reason the American government is such a good friend to Israel is because American Jewry is engaged at a grass roots level. Individuals take the time to get to know their local politicians face to face. They make sure they support the candidate who supports Israel and the Jewish community, and they make political contributions to those candidates. It is also crucial that we reach out to journalists. They don't deliberately write biased stories. Often they lack accurate facts which we should provide. Fortunately, the infrastructure will be created here in Canada to facilitate these activities thanks to the hard work of the Israel Emergency Cabinet and the generosity of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Federations. If we do not reach out first to educate with our message, our opponents will educate with their message. The first step is to make sure that you are educated about the facts. One of the best sources of information about the Israel-Palestinian conflict is Myths and Facts by Mitchell Bard www.us-israel.org/jsource/myths/mftoc.html. You can also subscribe to the Daily Alert for the best summary of daily news on the conflict at www.jcpa.org/daily/index.html. The next step is to get involved and do something, anything. There are two important sides to advocacy. There is the proactive side of educating others and there is a reactive side where we monitor and respond to what is being said and done by the media, politicians, and our fellow citizens. Both are equally important. If each of us does one little thing we will see change. I urge everyone to make the sacrifice for the next generation and for the generations who sacrificed so much before us.

Reflections on the Yom Kippur War

Our community's extraordinary commitment to Israel

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

The more things change, the more they stay the same. In this, the 30th anniversary year of the Yom Kippur War, that axiom best sums up Toronto's Jewish community when it comes to supporting Israel during its most precarious and vulnerable times.

Murray Koffler, Chair of UJA Federation's 1973 Campaign, addresses close to 1,000 donors at Toronto's Skyline Hotel, just after the end of Sukkot.

Today, members of Toronto's Jewish community are coming to Israel's aid with the same dedication, passion and commitment as their predecessors three decades earlier. UJA Federation Campaign 2004 has already raised $33 million to preserve Israel's vital social services, fight a worldwide wave of anti-Semitism and answer those who preach anti-Israel hatred.

Perhaps no one remembers that remarkable show of support in 1973 more than Murray Koffler, who chaired the UJA Federation campaign when war broke out.

"That was the most successful campaign in the history of Toronto at the time, and I remember we were acclaimed throughout North America as the most successful city per capita," says Koffler of the six-week campaign in 1973, which raised an unprecedented $26.5 million.

"I remember the mood of Jewish Torontonians back then as if it were yesterday," says Koffler. "We were all fired up with nervous excitement. In fact, maybe I was even a bit too fired up at the time, but, in the end, I think that unbridled enthusiasm helped matters."

Koffler and Gerry Halbert, Chair of that year's Campaign Cabinet, remember such a furious flurry of activity among donors that many took out loans to donate to the campaign, while others even spoke of mortgaging their homes to help Israel.

"It took a great deal of planning, and it took Murray's unyielding determination, drive and vision, to make that campaign the success that it was," says Halbert, who remembers working what seemed like endless hours to implement Koffler's plans. "We would meet every day to stay on top of things. We'd speak on the phone constantly, and when we thought we were finally finished for the day, we were suddenly back in another meeting about one issue or another."

As Campaign Chair, Koffler's philosophy for success was simple and to the point.

"He told everyone that he wanted – and expected – donors to triple their donations from the previous year," recalls Halbert. "Then, that night, in a meeting at Murray's home, six million dollars was raised on the spot in no time. Less than 12 hours later, at the first Major Gifts meeting held at the Skyline Hotel, with close to 1,000 people on hand, another $8 million was raised. Not a bad 12 hours when you think about it," Halbert adds with a grin.

Koffler recalls that session in the Skyline's main ballroom as one of the campaign's highlights.

"Absolutely," says Koffler. "I remember that we had Israel's Finance Minister at the time, Pinchas Sapir, and an Israeli general at that parlour meeting. Because it was held on Shmeni Atzeret (the first day after Sukkot), I had an Orthodox, Reform, and Conservative rabbi there to perform services. After that, Sapir spoke beautifully about how much Toronto was doing for the people of Israel. Then, we canvassed people on the spot. We'd call their name; they'd make a pledge. I'm quite sure that nobody left that room that entire day."

According to Steve Ain, a Past Executive Vice President of UJA, it was clear to anyone in attendance that they were going to be part of a unique experience.

"It was incredible," says Ain, who at the time was a young employee of Canadian Jewish Congress. "UJA drafted me on the spot to help out. I didn't even know how to fill out a pledge card, but man, did I learn quickly."

"There was such an outpouring of support and concern. All kinds of people would do any task – without complaining – to get this campaign going. We had one guy whose job it was to drive around to people's homes and businesses to collect the money, to clean up the previous campaign's outstanding pledges. I remember seeing shoeboxes full of cash coming in to the office. I can remember working 15 or 16 hours a day, non-stop, but it was such an important thing to be part of for a young guy. It was a remarkable experience."

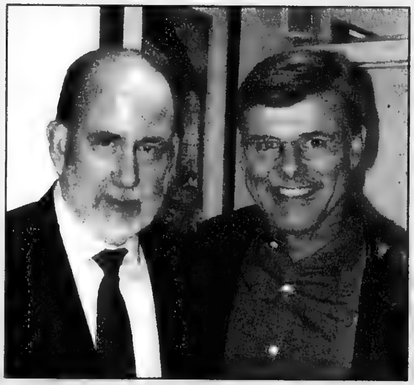
"We really saw what Toronto's Jewish community was all about back then," says Koffler. "Perhaps the greatest testament to Toronto was that Minister Sapir, until the day he died, would often refer to Toronto's Jewish community as a role model and a true success story. All the various divisions of donors came through with flying colours that year – whether it was the pharmacists, dentists, those in fashion, or the Women's Division. Toronto came through for Israel then as they continue to do today, some 30 years later."

Pinchas Sapir, Israel's Finance Minister in 1973, addresses UJA Federation donors at Toronto's Skyline Hotel.

Iran is the biggest terror threat

By WENDY LAMPERT

U.S. foreign policy expert Michael Ledeen sees Iran as "the driving force of international terrorism," and believes President George W. Bush should have gone after it before attacking Iraq.



U.S. foreign policy expert Michael Ledeen with UJA Federation Campaign 2004 Chair Richard Venn at a recent briefing.

The author of The War Against the Terror Masters recently told UJA Federation donors that Iran is "months" away from assembling and testing nuclear weapons.

Ledeen believes that toppling Iran would have a major impact on Islamic fundamentalism and terror. "The only way to resolve the situation is to defeat the terror masters," namely Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia. He said Iran, which created Hizbollah and provides money, training and weapons to many terrorist groups, is likely where Osama Bin Laden and Saddam Hussein are hiding today.

Ledeen praised the Bush administration for its willingness to take action against terror by invading Iraq. "Every U.S. President since Jimmy Carter has declared a war on terror. But it wasn't until September 12, 2001 that a President actually decided to wage a war on terror," he said. But he noted that George Bush is moving too slowly. "The U.S. spent too much time catering to international opinion before actually going to war."

"Spreading freedom around the world sometimes requires the use of force. We have to take initiative before the terror masters do," he said.

Ledeen compared the current state of anti-Semitism to the pre-World War II era. "In the 1930s and 1940s, what led to catastrophe was that the little things got by," he said. "The world is facing a similar situation today, culminating with the terror attacks on September 11, 2001. You cannot let any of the little things go by. You have to fight every single time."

Ledeen was one of several guest analysts featured during UJA Federation's Israel Today Speaker Series.

Chai Dancers celebrate their 25th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 25 years as director and choreographer of the Chai Dancers, a dance troupe for people 55 years and over, Teme Kernerman says she has accomplished what she set out to do.

"I wanted to prove that an amateur seniors group could perform in a professional framework," says Kernerman, who formed the group as part of the 55+ department of adult services at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

"I thought long and hard before I started the group because I wanted the dancers to be respected for what they could do, not for who they were," said Kernerman, founder and first full-time director of the dance department at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, and a former supervisor of the 55+ department at the BJCC.

Participants – currently the group is made up of 10 women but men are welcome – do not have to audition, says Kernerman, but they do need folk dance experience.

"It is a serious commitment. We practise for two hours twice a week and we work hard, but we get a lot of satisfaction. It is a labour of love; we plan our lives around rehearsals," she says.

In order to be able to perform for different types of audiences, they have a repertoire that includes Scottish, Latin American and Israeli dances. "We dance at synagogues, retirement homes and schools, and we've performed at Mel Lastman Square for Israeli Day.

"Several years ago, we were even in a dance scene that I choreographed in the movie Last Wish, with Patty Duke and Maureen Stapleton," Kernerman said.

Anita Budman, a member of the Chai Dancers, said that since becoming a stage performer she looks at dancers with a different eye. "Only other dancers know how much work is involved in planning a production."

Kernerman said she has had dancers who have remained with the group until the dancer felt it was too difficult to perform.

"Recently, a second generation dancer joined us. Her mother danced at least 10 years until she started going blind. I led her onto the stage for her last performance."

She said that when they perform for children, the children often giggle when they first come on stage. "They realize quickly, however, that it is something to watch. Their body language changes and they become involved in the dance. They see that it is an accomplished group with something to offer."

Adult audiences are also "quite amazed at how accomplished we are," said Budman. "It is a tight performance within a professional framework. Teme does not settle for sloppy work."

The Chai Dancers perform Lucero de La Manana, a Mexican dance done with shawls.

In choreographing the dances, said Kernerman, "I take a traditional folk dance and I change it so that when it is on stage it creates an interesting visual picture for the audience. We rehearse it again and again, and I often go over it my mind."

Kernerman, who 34 years ago, initiated Rikudiyah, the annual children's Israeli dance festival put on in conjunction with UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, says that dance is definitely for people of every age.

"My [motto] is 'to dance is to live – believe it.' It has always been my love, my passion and my therapy.

"People can be having a bad day, but when they come and dance for two hours they realize they can cope. They have the dancing, the music and the people – it is everything good combined."

For information on joining the troupe call Kernerman at 416-636-1880, ext. 364.

New in the Jewish day schools for 2003-2004

ASSOCIATED HEBREW SCHOOLS OF TORONTO

Mark Smiley

In July, after serving as headmaster of Hillel Day School of Metropolitan Detroit for 16 years, Mark Smiley assumed the position of director of education at Associated. Smiley is a graduate of AHS, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and the University of Toronto. He completed a doctorate in education and Jewish studies. He continues to serve as a faculty member of the Day School Principal's Training Program at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

The Hurwich Education Centre, which is home to the Danilack Middle School campus, recently completed a $7-million refurbishment.

BIALIK HEBREW DAY SCHOOL

A building expansion was completed, which increased the school's size by almost 40 per cent. The school has opened a second gymnasium, a lunch room, a science laboratory, an expanded library and eight different classrooms.

BNEI AKIVA SCHOOLS

Frank Samuels

Frank Samuels, who has a master's degree in English education and a diploma in community relations, has been appointed general studies principal at the Bnei Akiva Schools of Toronto, Yeshivat Or Chaim and Yeshivat Ulpanat Orot. Samuels was the past principal of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy and also served as general studies principal of the Johannesburg-based Yeshiva College of South Africa. He immigrated to Canada with his family in 2000.

EITZ CHAIM DAY SCHOOLS

Rabbi Yehoshua Steinman is the new general studies principal. He is a graduate of Johns Hopkins University with a master's degree in communicative disorders. He received his smichah from the New Israel Rabbinical College of Toronto and previously worked as the principal of the P'tach School of Baltimore.

LEO BAECK DAY SCHOOL

Sharon Levy

After teaching in the middle school for five years, Sharon Levy has been appointed middle school co-ordinator. Along with her teaching duties, Levy will provide support and guidance to teachers at Atkinson and Holy Blossom campuses. She will also assist in the organization and management of middle school curricular and co-curricular programs.

Desmond Bender

Desmond Bender has been appointed to develop and deliver a new civilizations program in the middle school as an enrichment to the middle school curriculum. Bender is a graduate of the York University Jewish Day School Principal's Certification Program, Part 1, and has been teaching in the school for the past 10 years.

PAUL PENNA DOWNTOWN JEWISH DAY SCHOOL

The school opened its doors to its permanent location in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at the corner of Spadina Avenue and Bloor Street.

TORONTO JEWISH ACADEMY OHR MENACHEM

Rabbi Yisroel Dovid Goldstein

The new principal, Rabbi Yisroel Dovid Goldstein, qualified as a rabbi at the Rabbinical College of Canada. He has taught in elementary and secondary schools in Brooklyn and Queens in New York, N.Y., and worked as a camp and educational director at summer camps in the United States and Russia. After qualifying as an emergency medical technician, Goldstein has been a volunteer with Hatzalah for the past 3½ years. Most recently, Rabbi Goldstein was principal and executive director of the Ohr Menachem Yeshiva Day School in San Francisco, Calif.

Bob Plestch

Retired elementary public school principal and trustee Bob Plestch has also joined the school to provide a new curriculum that will emphasize mathematics and science, as well as special instruction for those who excel.

ZAREINU HIGH SCHOOL

In order to continue its elementary special education and therapeutic services, Zareinu has opened a high school program for girls 13 to 16 years old, located at Bais Yaakov High School. The students receive specially adapted programs in English and Hebrew studies and are included in Bais Yaacov classes for any subjects that will allow for successful inclusion.

New in the supplementary Jewish schools

BETH ISRAEL HEBREW ACADEMY

A new Hebrew program will be opening on Sundays at Bakersfield Public School and a junior kindergarten will begin at Alexander Mackenzie High School in Richmond Hill.

DOWNTOWN JEWISH COMMUNITY SCHOOL

This September, the DJCS reopened in the renovated Miles Nadal JCC at the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue. The school will have access to new classrooms and a state-of-the-art theatre.

TORAH TOTS PRESCHOOL

This year, the school has included a Montessori segment in the junior kindergarten/early childhood education class. The school also provides a traditional approach and hands-on technique in presenting Judaic stories, Shabbat and holidays. All areas of the curriculum are covered, including math principles, skills and problem solving, science, geography, history, art and music.

A BAGEL TALE...
A man from Mars landed in Manhattan, entered a bakery and asked the owner: "What are those little wheels in the window?" "Wheels? What wheels?" The Martian pointed. "Those aren't wheels." The balebos smiled. "They're called bagels. We eat them... Here, try one." The Martian bit into a bagel and smacked his lips. "Man! This would go great with cream cheese and lox."

Meir Panim: Relief and Comfort For Israel's Poor

By Debbie Maimon

For 8-year old Eli Shevach of Kiryat Malachi, lunchtime is the most difficult hour of the day. He tries not to stare as his classmates savor their hot lunches while he picks at the piece of dry bread he brought from home. Sometimes there is a thin paste of butter or jam on the bread which makes it easier to swallow.

But the lump in his throat is a different matter. It seems to grow bigger as he watches his classmates bite into the mouth-watering food in their lunch containers. It is all he can do to restrain himself from grabbing for their leftovers before they toss them in the garbage.

"With over 20% of Israel's citizens living below the poverty line, hunger is a daily reality for many of our children." Mr. Gluck, Eli's principal, says. "The economic crisis has plunged countless household into desperate straits."

He repeated what Eli's teacher told him about a daily scenario in her classroom that moved her to tears.

"At lunchtime, many of the children from the poorest homes sit around listlessly, with nothing to eat. The luckier ones are eating hot soup, pasta, rice, baked potatoes….And these poor kids look on with sad, hungry eyes. You want to cry for them."

Other teachers report that poverty is so rampant in some homes that the needier students can not even look forward to a nourishing hot meal when they come home later in the day.

"Lack of proper nutrition was taking its toll on their physical and emotional health. The situation was reaching emergency proportions in this town," said Mr. Gluck. "Until Meir Panim came into the picture."

A charitable social-service organization that sponsors food kitchens for the needy as well as hot lunch programs for thousands of hungry schoolchildren, Meir Panim opened its Kiryat Malachi branch early last year.

Every day, the organization serves hot meals free of charge to hundreds of diners. In addition, the soup kitchen prepares 1,700 hot school lunches a day, providing all of Kiryat Malachi kindergarteners and elementary schoolchildren with tasty, healthful meals for a nominal fee. In cases of extreme need, even that small fee is waived.

While the harsh realities of Israel's current economic crisis mean hunger and privation in countless homes across the country, Meir Panim has brought a measure of blessed relief to families in Kiryat Malachi, as well as a number of other cities: Jerusalem, Haifa, Kiryat Arba-Hebron, Acco and Eilat .

"They've accomplished miracles," Mr. Gluck said. "All of our children now enjoy a least one hot, nutritious meal a day in school. The difference this has made in the lives of children like Eli is just incredible. On every level—in terms of their self-esteem, all-around health, better learning, better spirits—they are different children."

A new central Meir Panim kitchen will be opening shortly in Ofakim to serve Israel's southern region. This new branch will prepare 10,000 hot nourishing meals daily for needy students in Ofakim, Kiryat Gat, Beer Sheva, Yerocham, and Dimona.

Ties That Bind

Meir Panim, which means "a friendly face," was established in 2000 by David and Rifka Zilbershlag in memory of their son, Meir, who died of a rare eating disorder. The couple's dream was to ease the suffering of thousands of families in Israel who cannot afford even basic food staples.

The program's first initiative was to open a soup kitchen in the heart of Jerusalem. Five other branches opened the following year in Haifa, Kiryat Malachi, Kiryat Arba-Hebron, Acco and Eilat. Thanks to the support of generous donors, Meir Panim was able to open four additional branches this year, in Ofakim, Dimona, Beer-Sheva and Kiryat Gat.

Plans are afoot to establish a hot lunch program for schoolchildren in every city with a Meir Panim soup kitchen. To date, such programs are already operating in Jerusalem, Kiryat Arba-Hebron, and as described above, in Kiryat Malachi.

The clientele at Meir Panim soup kitchens include new immigrants, the unemployed, the elderly and the handicapped, and those who for any number of reasons have fallen on hard times. Victims of terror, bedridden and ill individuals all have their meals delivered to them by Meir Panim volunteers.

What motivated Zilbershlag, who is the editor of the Hebrew-language newspaper Bakehila and the owner of a media and public relations firm, to throw himself into such an unconventional enterprise? He says he drew his inspiration for his humanitarian work from Judaism's core values.

"One of the things which kept Jews together in bad times is the belief that all Jews are responsible for one another. Chessed, kindness, is the tie that binds. It has the power to unite a fragmented community."

Without Shame

Zilbershlag stresses the importance of eliminating the sense of shame associated with accepting food from a soup kitchen. To make dining in Meir Panim a pleasant experience, he designed the soup kitchens to resemble comfortable and homey restaurants instead of charity-dispensing outfits. The tasteful furniture, and aesthetic food arrangements, caring service and not least, the excellent quality of the food, make the needy feel like honored guests instead of paupers.

In addition to combating hunger, Meir Panim sponsors free medical and legal aid to the indigent, to immigrants, or to those who lack the strength or the know-how to look after their own rights. A corps of volunteer physicians and attorneys provides vital services to Meir Panim "clients" in these situations.

Meir Panim has been an invaluable source of aid and comfort to victims of terror. When terrorists struck Hebron several months ago in the "Friday Night Massacre," and after the bus bombings in Jerusalem and shootings in Netanya, Meir Panim's volunteers sprang into action, providing meals free of charge for the victims, their families and the mourners sitting shivah.

The Power of Giving

For Meir Panim's founders, the capacity to "think big" has spawned yet a third program, Power of Giving (Koach Latet). This remarkable enterprise consists of a national aid center which collects a huge array of second-hand household appliances and merchandise for repair and recycling. Volunteers clean and restore the items to working condition, for the benefit of needy families throughout Israel.

"With more and more people living in poverty, families are sometimes desperate for things as basic as refrigerator, stove or washing machine," explained Zilbershlag. "Sometimes they don't even have a bed for a child, a table and chairs, or a heater for the wintertime."

In the short span of two years, fifteen Power of Giving branches have opened throughout Israel, rescuing many families from grinding poverty and near-destitution. The generosity of the community and of idealistic businessmen has led to the establishment of POG centers in Jerusalem, Safed, Chatzor, Yokneam, Netanya, Petach Tikva, Kiryat Arba, Kiryat Malachi, Kiryat Gat, Beer Sheva, Eilat, Yeruham, Migdal Haemek and Kiryat Shmona.

Extending a Hand to the Needy

The plight of Israel's hungry has moved many, both in Israel and around the world. Four cantors from the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements have joined together to produce a series of benefit concerts to help the "Meals for Children" program. Cantors Avi Albrecht, Melvin Luterman, Saul Z. Hamerman and Emanuel C. Perlman have orchestrated a variety of musical events including Jewish, Israeli and Cantorial music to be performed by a host of artists and performers who will tour across the United States. The singers, musicians, and concert producers are graciously volunteering their talents and time with the hope of helping Israel's needy children. All proceeds will go to the "Meals For Children" fund, a subsidiary of Meir Panim. The first concert will be held in Long Island on November 17, 2003, with additional concerts to follow during the year.

With the approach of the High Holidays, Jews the world over look for opportunities to renew their commitment to Jewish values and to merit another year of life, health and prosperity. With this thought in mind, Meir Panim invites compassionate people everywhere to join in the effort to eliminate poverty and hunger in Israel.

Writer creates female superheroes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The first issue of Eclipse & Vega and (inset) Saul Colt (right) with Stan Lee, creator of Spiderman.

Saul Colt believes that comic books should get more respect.

The creator and publisher of Eclipse & Vega, a comic book series featuring two female superheroes, also runs a comic book shop on the Internet at www.ssscomics.com.

Colt, who has been passionate about comics for as long as he can remember – his favourite childhood comics were Batman, Spiderman and Daredevil – believes it is an artform not taken seriously enough.

"There are enormously talented people in the industry, and anything that gets kids reading is valuable," he says. "Comics help kids learn to put ideas together on paper.

"They are not only for young kids. Comics are suitable for everyone. Movies such as Road to Perdition and Men in Black have been based on graphic novels."

Colt, 31, says he thought of the idea for Eclipse & Vega while planning to publish a Web guide for comic book collectors. "I designed the characters as tour guides and then decided to incorporate them into a comic.

"I've always wanted to write, but if I wrote and produced a movie script, it would cost thousands and thousands of dollars. A comic book can be produced on a reasonable budget," he says.

Although he does not do the actual drawings, he has full control, "almost like a director. I write each panel and describe exactly what is going on.

"Before introducing a character I develop a profile so I am not guessing while I am writing. I know all about the character ahead of time."

His stories are based on the real world, he says.

"I keep a notebook of things I could possibly put into my stories. When I was writing my first edition, I saw a knife-sharpening truck. I hadn't seen one in years, and decided to write it into the script."

His comic recently attained notoriety when it appeared on the CBS show Yes, Dear, a show about two sets of young parents living in the same house.

"I had been at the San Diego Comicon convention to promote my comic. A lot of producers attend the convention in order to find material.

"One of the CBS producers liked my characters and my ideas, and decided to write the comic into the show [which aired Sept. 29].

"The premise was that some characters travelled to the convention and while there, stood in front of my booth. Someone even played me standing behind the booth. I'm very excited about the show; it's a tremendous opportunity."

Colt plans on travelling to other comic conventions – he will be a guest this month at the Las Vegas comic convention – to promote Eclipse & Vega, and he will continue promoting it on his Web site.

But he is not quitting his day job. "I still work in the family business, Dennis Colt Packaging, while my wife Cheryl, does a lot of the marketing for my comics."

Community advocacy agencies restructured

The cabinet, created in the spring of 2002, is concerned about the community's response to a surge in anti-Semitic incidents and the growth of anti-Israel agitation on campuses. The cabinet is chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tannenbaum of Toronto and Stephen Cummings of Montreal. Other cabinet members include Israel Asper, Brent Belzberg, Julia Koschitzky, Stephen Reitman and Ron Stern. The cabinet hired GPC International, a government and public relations firm headed by Hershell Ezrin, to review the work of community organizations and recommend possible areas of change.

"The work of establishing the new organization is certainly an ongoing task, but in passing this resolution [creating CIJA] we have sent a message that the Jewish community is entering a new era and will work actively with current and new resources to meet the challenges of today," said Shoel Silver, president of UIAFC.

"The goal of CIJA is to strengthen communal relationships with public bodies and provide the community [with] co-ordinated mechanisms for widespread grassroots involvement on a national scale," the UIAFC said in a statement.

CIJA will likely consist of a board of 18 to 22 people, including members of the emergency cabinet.

Finkelstein said that while details have yet to be finalized, she believes "the emergency cabinet will continue to function in an oversight capacity until [CIJA] is running and it will morph into CIJA."

The CIJA board will be chosen on the basis of geographical representation, gender and age to ensure it is inclusive, Finkelstein said.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which receives its funding from UIAFC, welcomed the creation of CIJA. "It is a positive move for the Jewish community as I believes it will strengthen community's established organizations and increase resources and make our efforts to combat anti-Semitism, intolerance and anti-Israelism more effective," said CJC president Keith Landy.

Landy would not directly address rumours that consideration was given in recent months to drastically altering Congress' governing structure.

"There have been negotiations where UIAFC has recognized the importance of a strengthened, democratically-elected CJC," Landy said, adding Congress will "look to streamline the processes" by which it is governed.

Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of CIC, said the agency is currently in the midst of a 30-day transition period to implement changes to its governing structure.

As to the CIC's day-to-day operations, Fogel said he has been told CIC will receive a larger budget and will be expected to share services. "I'm not sure what that means," he said.

Fogel speculated CIC staff will continue to make policy recommendations, now to the new CIC board, and those suggestions will be related to the CIJA board for approval.

Fogel said the CIC should benefit from a more co-ordinated approach to Israel advocacy. One of the issues confronting the organization in recent years has been that other organizations "have crept into the Israel file."

With an enhanced budget, CIC will also be able to increase the number of educational missions to Israel involving parliamentarians and their staff, he said.

Outgoing CIC chair Joseph Wilder said he couldn't "agree with everything in the new setup. In fact, I'm not even sure precisely what the new structure is going to be. But I do know that as a result of the [emergency] cabinet, the resources we've always needed are finally going to be available for the very crucial work we do. So, if I agree or not, it is far less important than getting the job done right, which is crucial to all of us."

"I'm willing to watch progress and see how it works… The [emergency] cabinet has stressed that is is only going to be involved for a three-year period on a governance basis and presumably the present form of governance is a temporary, emergency measure."

Thomas Hecht, a member of the CIC national board and former chair of CIC Quebec, said the process leading to change should have been more "transparent." While there is need for an organizational restructuring, too much of the discussions took place behind closed doors, he said.

Hecht said he was still in the dark whether the CIC national board still exists and he wondered whether "the Jewish community would agree with the [GPC] report, in terms of restructuring and policy. I don't know if the Jewish community of Canada would agree with some of the remedial measures."

The cabinet members, he continued "are well-intentioned. I think it's the federations who are taking over and the heavy hitters in the federations who will have control of advocacy."

Asked to comment on Hecht's concerns, Finkelstein said "there are different ways of consulting." Much consultation has involved the federations, which fund the national organizations, and there has been discussion with CJC and CIC on budgetary matters, she said. "There's been quite a bit of openness in terms of what we're doing."

Restructuring community organizations has been on the agenda for close to 20 years, Finkelstein said. The cabinet "took a strong stand" and is "supported by the community… These donors have chosen to work through our system and that's going to [include] a variety of inputs," including employing their personal connections to promote Jewish advocacy, she said.

'Refusenik' pilots a case study in news judgment

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Just before Rosh Hashanah, the protest by a group of Israeli retired and reserve pilots against targeted killings of Palestinian terrorists created a sensation in Israel. It was also reported by the international media. While undoubtedly a valid news item, even if it discomfited many of Israel's defenders, the amount of attention paid to the story varied widely, raising interesting questions about news judgment.

When the story broke on Sept. 25, the Globe and Mail merely ran a brief New York Times wire service item in its mid-front-section "World in Brief" column, while the National Post did not cover the pilots at all. The New York Times ran a report by correspondent Greg Myre on its inside pages.

Turning to television, CTV National News placed the report on the "refusenik" pilots, by its new Mideast correspondent Janis Mackey Frayer, near the bottom of its newscast, while CBC's The National made it the lead item, a decision that says a lot about the CBC's sense of proportion.

Nevertheless, CBC's Mideast correspondent Adrienne Arsenault dealt fairly and sensitively with the story itself.

"It's hard to overstate the effect of this protest," Arsenault said. "In a land whose very survival is dependent on its armed forces, pilots are revered as the elite. A break in their ranks is considered a dangerous blow to the entire country's morale."

Arsenault also interviewed two pilots who opposed the protesters. One, who challenged the moral argument about opposing actions in which innocents can also become victims, said: "We [also] have to think what will be the casualties of innocent people on our [Israeli] side if we want to be able to hit these terrorists in Gaza."

The second pilot, while generally sympathetic to the protesters' moral position, took issue with the propriety of their actions: "My only problem is that it became a political statement and when pilots in the military are [making] political statements, it's a problem. It's not good."

Arsenault pointed out that of the 27 protesters, only nine are still on active duty. This fact was also noted by CTV's Lloyd Robertson during his introduction to Frayer's reports, but absent from many other news reports on the issue.

The pilots' professional status was further clarified in a Sept. 28 Ha'aretz editorial, which said that of the small number who are still in the air force reserves, "not one was ordered to carry out a mission whose legality he questioned and whose execution he refused." The paper, well known for its left-leaning views and frequent criticism of Israeli government actions, firmly rebuked the protesters for "acting irresponsibly and in a way that may cost the public heavily."

But while the pilots came in for immediate censure from the Israeli media and government, their protest also served to highlight the moral debate taking place within Israel. In a telephone interview, Israeli journalist and Mideast analyst Jim Lederman remarked about the "extraordinary spectacle" of seeing "a humanitarian streak that you would not find in any other air force in the world."

George Jonas' column in the National Post (Sept. 29) summed the whole issue up it well: "The debate [over the pilots' action] whichever side one takes, underlines the difference between the Jewish state and its opponents. Having a moral dilemma requires a moral capacity. This is why Israelis have qualms while their enemies [like Hamas] have none."

Montreal man with Nazi past lied to enter Canada, court rules

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Walter Obodzinsky has become the second Montrealer whose concealment of his past as a Nazi collaborator could lead to his denaturalization and deportation from Canada.

But whether Obodzinsky, 84, lives long enough to be expelled from Canadian soil is open to question.

The Federal Court of Canada, in a case dating back three years, ruled late last month that Obodzinsky, a resident of St. Leonard who became a Canadian citizen in 1955, arrived in Canada in 1950 under false pretenses by hiding the fact he collaborated with the German army and was a voluntary member of a Nazi-controlled police unit in German-occupied Belarus that murdered civilians and Jews.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Justice Department's war crimes unit in Ottawa hailed the Sept. 19 ruling, but both acknowledged the process involved in stripping someone of their citizenship and deporting them in such cases can last years.

Obodzinsky's trial, which began in July 2002, capped a long, sometimes frustrating process that seems to be the hallmark of such cases. For two years, his lawyers sought to have the case stayed for health reasons (Obodzinsky has had several heart attacks), using up assorted appeals until proceedings finally got underway 15 months ago.

In his ruling, Judge François Lemieux wrote that "Obodzinsky obtained his Canadian citizenship by fraud, false declarations and deliberate concealment of essential facts."

Obodzinsky is a native of Mir in Ukraine (now Belarus), where he joined an SS unit that, in late 1941, massacred 1,500 of the area's Jews.

Lemieux wrote that while there was no direct evidence connecting Obodzinsky directly to killing someone, "oral and documentary evidence shows that the defendant was party to the perpetration of atrocities."

Now that the Federal Court has ruled in his case, there is no appeal of the decision. But according to Terry Beitner, the war crimes unit's director of general counsel, the ruling could be subject to "judicial review" if the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration decides to revoke Obodzinsky's citizenship, the next step before deporting him.

Vladimir Katriuk, the other Montrealer found to have hidden his Nazi past in order to enter Canada, is still on Canadian soil almost five years after the Federal Court also ruled against him.

The delay is due to an achingly slow process in such cases, said Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president of CJC.

Besides Katriuk, other cases awaiting final resolution include those of Helmut Oberlander, whose case is still under judicial review, also five years after the Federal Court ruled he lied to enter Canada; Wasyl Odynsky, almost four years since a similar ruling; and Michael Baumgartner, three years after a similar finding.

CJC urges Liberals not to act rashly on EETC

"I'm very disappointed," said Jewish education funding activist Georgeanne Burke of Molinari's loss. "The Jewish community came out strongly for her, but she just got caught up in the red tide."

David Young

Caplan fended off a spirited challenge in Don Valley East from Paul Sutherland, a popular Toronto municipal councillor, winning by more than 8,000 votes.

In Eglinton-Lawrence, Mike Colle defeated Tory candidate Corrine Korzen by a nearly 2-1 margin. Nevertheless, Korzen made history by being the first Orthodox Jewish woman to seek a seat at Queen's Park. The riding has a sizeable Orthodox population in the Bathurst-Lawrence area, with many of them signed-up members of the federal Canadian Alliance.

In St. Paul's, which is about one-fifth Jewish, incumbent Michael Bryant coasted to victory by more than 13,000 votes. Julian Heller, a Jewish lawyer and longtime NDP activist, polled 6,740 votes.

And in Vaughan-King-Aurora, Liberal Party president Greg Sorbara, who's on record as supporting some form of relief for parents of children in private schools, easily defeated his nearest Tory opponent by more than 15,000 votes.

The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto sent a statement Friday morning after the election congratulating McGuinty.

"We look forward to working with the new government in the months and years ahead on a wide variety of issues. The concerns of the Jewish community are not dissimilar to those of Ontarians at large – health, education, poverty, tolerance and security," said region chair Ed Morgan.

Congress acknowledged that in the past, it has had "serious differences with Mr. McGuinty and his party on the issue of public funding for religiously based schools.

"We strongly encourage him to think long and hard about the situation of Ontario's non-Roman Catholic families who want faith-based education for their children. It would be most regrettable if the government were to act rashly in eliminating the EETC without any alternative in mind.

"We are hopeful that when the cabinet meets it will come to understand that an Ontario which supports only one faith-based school system in effect supports religious discrimination," Morgan wrote.

CJC added it hopes McGuinty will make fighting discrimination a priority.

"We urge Premier-elect McGuinty to keep an open mind on an issue of such deep concern to our community. The time to solve this decades-old problem is now," CJC said.

Survivor chosen to represent spirit of multiculturalism

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Ibolya Grossman, a Hungarian-born Jewish woman who survived the Holocaust with her baby and escaped the 1956 Revolution, was one of three immigrants selected to inaugurate Canada's first annual Multiculturalism Day this past summer at a ceremony in Ottawa.

The three presenters were chosen to represent all Canadian immigrants. They are part of the "Passages to Canada" speakers bureau, which sends immigrant community leaders into schools and communities to talk about their experiences and journey to Canada.

The bureau is part of "Passages to Canada," an educational initiative developed by the Dominion Institute that aims to provide Canadians with a greater understanding of the contributions immigrants make to Canada.

The other two speakers were Enrique Robert, a human rights lawyer who escaped from El Salvador and initially shoveled snow to make ends meet in Canada, and Dudley Laws, a social activist and community leader who came to Canada from Jamaica and worked at first as a welder.

Ibolya Grossman stands with her son Andy Reti at the launch of his new book The Son of an Extraordinary Woman.

Grossman's husband, parents and sisters were killed by the Nazis. During the war, she and her young son were in the Budapest ghetto and she was once jailed for six months for trying to escape.

Grossman, known as Ibi, came to Canada in 1957, first to Winnipeg.

Not knowing any English, she immediately enrolled in language classes and a year-and-a-half later, she and her teenage son moved to Toronto, where she first worked as a cleaning woman at the Toronto Western Hospital and then as a clerk at the Bank of Montreal, where "my study of English paid off," she says.

In 1958, she married Emil Grossman.

After her retirement, she became a volunteer at the Hospital for Sick Children and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, and she joined the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, where she enrolled in a creative writing class.

Grossman also recorded her experiences in a 1990 autobiography, An Ordinary Woman in Extraordinary Times. She was subsequently awarded the Joseph Tanenbaum Prize in Holocaust literature by the book committee of Toronto Jewish Congress and has spoken to numerous groups and schools.

Her book is used as a text in courses at York University and the University of Toronto.

Recently, her son Andy Reti published a book, The Son of an Extraordinary Woman, which will be featured at this year's Toronto Jewish Book Fair. In it, he describes his experiences coming to Canada and describes what hardworking immigrants can accomplish in a democracy.

Grossman will be a speaker during Holocaust Education Week. On Nov. 2, she and son Andy and grandson David will present a program at Kehillat Shaarei Torah Synagogue titled "Three Generations Speak About the Holocaust." On Nov. 3, she will appear at Indigo Books, Music and Café at 55 Bloor St. West.

UWO students concerned about Palestinian club

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish students at the University of Western Ontario are concerned that the founding there of a branch of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), the group connected to the violence at Concordia University in September 2002, could signal a change in the political climate on their campus.

On Sept. 25, the club brought in controversial speaker Norman Finkelstein, a political science professor and author of the book The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering. Finkelstein, a son of Holocaust survivors who is considered by many, including B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress, to hold anti-Semitic views, discussed the "roots" of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict before an audience of more than 600 people.

But on the whole, Western has been less political than other Canadian campuses, said Paul Rakowski, past president of Western's Jewish Students' Union (JSU) and co-chair of its Israel Action Committee.

JSU president Gary Diamond, who has met with his counterpart at the Muslim Students' Association, speaks optimistically of "sustainable relations" and a possible joint humanitarian program.

Although there have been other political speakers besides Finkelstein on campus, Rakowski said there is only a small contingent of student activists who are "not at the same level" as their counterparts at some other schools.

"The situation is a lot more civil here," he said. "You might have a group of pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students yelling at each other. That's as bad as it gets."

Rakowski and others from the JSU met with representatives of Western's student council to express their concerns following club week, when the Palestinian human rights group handed out anti-Israel literature.

Among the material students objected to was an accusation that the "U.S. and Israeli interests… neatly converge in seeking the destruction of not only the Palestinian movement, but of the Palestinians as a people."

Rakowski says SPHR is "infamous for creating a climate of hate."

Fortunately, he said, Western has "clear guidelines" on activities that are acceptable for a ratified club. Conditions for deratification include committing an illegal offence and damaging the student council and university's reputation.

Rakowski was among an estimated 100 Jewish students who attended the lecture to monitor and/or challenge Finkelstein. In a letter to Western's daily student newspaper, the Gazette, Rakowski wrote that Finkelstein "categorically blamed Israelis" and "not once did he make any significant reference to Palestinian terrorism, an incontrovertible hindrance to the peace process and the trigger of so many hard-line Israeli policies."

Alana Getzler, a second-year student and the JSU's Holocaust awareness commissioner, wrote to The CJN that she has never "encountered such malevolence in a supposed academic forum.

"In his whole two hours of enlightening his audience with fallacy and myths," Getzler wrote, "Finkelstein not once mentioned… any type of wrongdoing on the Palestinian behalf, nor did he mention any type of right doing on the Israeli behalf."

His lecture, she said, was not "just pro-Palestinian. It was anti-Israel. There's a difference… There was hatred in his speech."

She said SPHR – which co-sponsored Finkelstein's talk with the political science and anthropology departments, as well as the Undergraduate Political Science Association – is a "hate club. The JSU is interested in programming to make people aware of Israel's situation from our viewpoint, and I think the Muslim Students' Association and Arab Students' Association are doing the same thing."

The Finkelstein event and resulting fallout, particularly an editorial cartoon in the Sept. 30 Gazette, has shocked some Jewish students.

The paper's editor-in-chief, Emmet Macfarlane, said he received four or five in-person complaints and three or four letters about the offending cartoon, which depicted two young women. One, with a somewhat confused expression says, "I objectively disagree with some of the policies of the Israeli government," and the other, with an angry face and a t-shirt bearing the term "Rage-a-holic," points an accusatory finger and says, "Anti-Semite!!!"

The cartoon, Macfarlane believes, was making a legitimate point about emotional reactions. "I think there are members of both sides who are intelligent and want to debate in an honest, open way."

Had controversial, pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes – who spoke at Western in the spring – been the recent speaker instead of Finkelstein, the characters in the cartoon would have been reversed, he said.

The Gazette "has never taken a position on the [Middle East] conflict," Macfarlane said. "We just focused on cries for censorship."

There has always been active debate at Western, he said. "We're proud, as Western students, that there's never been any type of violence."

Sukkot – a time to be creative

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Sukkot comes on the fifth day after Yom Kippur and lasts for seven days. During that time, we construct and spend time in a sukkah, to remember the protection God gave the Jewish people for the 40 years they spent travelling in the desert.

Right after we break the Yom Kippur fast, my husband and kids are outside the kitchen door putting up the sukkah, which will be our home for seven days. The whole neighbourhood is at it, too, and you can hear pounding until late at night. The atmosphere is electric. A neighbour might come over to borrow a saw; we borrow staples for our staple gun. The Jerusalem Municipality sets up distribution points around the city for the free distribution of schach, tree branches to top the sukkah (the trees are trimmed just before Sukkot to ensure ample supplies).

Then there are the decorations. This is a serious affair. Years ago, the kids decided that the decorations must be in the same place each year, so they get out last year's pictures to study placement. The sukkah is big: 30 feet by about five feet, so there are a lot of walls and ceilings to decorate with arts and crafts projects from years ago along with this year's artwork. Favourite themes for decorations include the 12 tribes of Israel and the seven species of the Land of Israel. I'm not allowed to peek until the sukkah is completely decorated and furnished with tables and chairs, pull-out couches, rugs and lighting. After days of work, the rest of the family calls me in for an inspection and I invariably get misty eyed at the sight of our beautiful sukkah.

As for me, post-Yom Kippur, I'm busy in the kitchen: defrosting and cooking and baking and freezing and defrosting once again. The week-long holiday presents many opportunities to welcome guests for festive meals and/or home baked goodies and hot or cold drinks, depending on the weather. Enjoy!

POMEGRANATE SALAD

The pomegranate is one of the species for which the Land of Israel is noted. Many people even hang pomegranates from the ceiling of their sukkah. This salad can serve either as a first-course or a light dessert.

3 medium pomegranates
¼ cup oil juice of ½ lemon
pinch of salt
1 tsp. sugar
melon halves

Open pomegranates and section. Remove seeds, carefully taking out any of the bitter, white pith. Place in a bowl. Combine oil, lemon juice, salt and sugar. Pour over pomegranate seeds. Chill. Fill melon halves with the prepared seeds.

NUT-DATE STUFFED CHICKEN BREASTS

This dish is easier to make than it may seem at first glance and looks and tastes very special. Dates are also one of the Land of Israel specials that are appropriate for Sukkot. Use any of your favourite nuts, even though pistachios are a perfect foil for the subtle sweetness of the dates. A kitchen shears makes it much easier to cut the dates – dip it into a glass of water when necessary. Makes 8-10 main dish servings.

4 whole large chicken breasts, skinned, boned and halved lengthwise
3½ oz. pistachio nuts, shelled and roughly chopped
3½ oz. dates, cut into small pieces
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼-½ tsp. crushed red pepper
½ tsp. cumin
½ cup vegetable oil
½ cup semi-dry white wine

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease a shallow, rectangular baking dish.

Place chicken pieces, boned side up, between two layers of clear plastic wrap. Working from centre out, pound chicken lightly with a mallet to make pieces about ¼-in. thick. Peel off wrap.

Combine nuts, dates and seasonings in a small bowl. Place 1 tbsp. of mixture in the centre of each prepared chicken piece. Tuck in sides and roll up like a jelly roll, pressing to seal well. Transfer to baking dish. Repeat with remaining pieces.

Drizzle with vegetable oil and wine. Cover with aluminum foil. Bake for approximately 1 hour or until tender.

Remove from oven. Either serve immediately or chill in refrigerator for at least two hours, then slice crosswise with a sharp knife for a "pinwheel" effect.

CHOCOLATE CHERRY BARS

Combine two favourite tastes in one tempting bar cake.

3 cups flour, sifted
2½ tsp. baking powder
1½ cups margarine
1½ cups sugar
6 eggs
12 oz. chocolate chips
2 cups canned, pitted cherries, well-drained and quartered (check for pits!)

Preheat oven to 325. Lightly grease a 13x9x2-inch pan. Stir flour and baking powder together. Set aside. Cream margarine and sugar together until light and fluffy. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Add flour mixture and mix well. Mix in chocolate chips and cherries, combining well. Spread evenly in pan. Bake for 35-45 minutes or until golden and starting to pull away from the edges. Score into bars when hot; cut when completely cool. Makes about 40 bars.

URGENT APPEAL FOR HIGH HOLIDAYS FOOD FOR NEEDY ISRAELI FAMILIES!

The High Holidays are here and in the town of Tzfat, a community in northern Israel, there is an urgent need to relieve hunger. Due to the severe economic downturn, job loss and reduced incomes have left many families nowhere to turn.

THEY NEED OUR IMMEDIATE HELP!

The organizers of the High Holiday Food Drive in Tzfat, have been involved for many years in providing food to the needy families that have registered for help. Unfortunately, this year over 300 families (comprising 3,000 individuals) have asked for help!

Each package of food that is given to a needy family costs $300 Canadian.
$300 Canadian is not so much in the scheme of things when you have a job.
But for a family left with no income this amount means a High Holidays of dignity and hope.

Any help to these families will be a blessing - let them know you care.

Canadian Dollars Per Case of Food: $185 Meat $75 Tuna $72 Chicken $60 Wine $95 Oil $55 Eggs $28 Fresh Fruits/Vegetables

You can specify which item (or family package) your contribution should pay for, or you can leave the choice to the Israeli organizers to allocate funds to buy the most needed items.

Candy sukkah sweetens the holiday

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

I have been thinking a lot about roots lately. About where I would like to settle with my daughter, buy a house, adopt a puppy. Because when we left our hometown of Atlanta eight years ago, I didn't know how long our adventure would last. I didn't know we would live in small but charming apartments, first in calm, rainy Portland, then in frenetic, sunny Los Angeles. And that after a while, the temporary nature of our dwellings, and so much time spent far away from where we started, would pose a question of its own. Where do we belong?

It seems the core ritual of Sukkot, building the sukkah, has something to say about just that. According to tradition, this temporary, four-walled structure with a roof of branches open to the sky is a reminder of the Israelites' huts in the desert, as they wandered from place to place for 40 years. But Michael Strassfeld says in The Jewish Holidays, A Guide & Commentary, the sukkah also highlights one of the themes of the holiday – the impermanence of our lives.

Strassfeld explains that in a talmudic debate over the meaning of the sukkah, Rabbi Akiva says, "The Sukkah makes us realize what sheltering is all about," and that our permanent homes, with glass windows, high walls and locked doors, are not where true security lies.

Strassfeld adds that Rabbi Akiva's view is that carrying our dishes and our food outside to be eaten in a portable, shaky structure reminds us that "we must be able to carry a sense of shelter with us wherever we go because to become too rooted in one place makes us inflexible."

And if the wind rattles the walls, or raindrops interfere with dinner, Rabbi Akiva feels the sukkah teaches us that "no one can protect his or her spirit from all of life's contingencies."

Beth Shir Shalom, the small synagogue my daughter and I discovered a few years ago not far from our apartment, has a special Sukkot ritual that deliciously honours the rewards of temporary but open, creative shelters. Each year, in the back parking lot, near the Sukkah they build and the small petting zoo they invite, they fill a long, folding table with boxes of graham crackers, tubs of frosting, and bowls and bowls of candy. And the children gather round to build graham cracker sukkot held together by chocolate and vanilla mortar and brought to joyous life with stripes of licorice roofs, marshmallow windows and walls decorated in red, yellow, green, blue and orange fruit-shaped candies.

They lick their fingers and make a terrific mess, but they each build something closer to a sugar-coated memory than a long-lasting house.

After the rabbi and cantor say the prayers and sing in the real sukkah and my daughter and I leave carrying her thickly frosted sukkah, I feel grateful for having been there, and for balmy evenings in the California air. And when we step inside our apartment, turn on a small light and take one bite of the candy-coated roof and then another, and watch the moon hang in our porch window while the chocolate layers dissolve in our mouth until the sukkah is no more, I understand the heart of home, permanent or not, beats in these moments.

FROSTED CANDY SUKKAH

1 lb. box honey graham crackers
1 16-oz. container chocolate frosting
1 16-oz. container vanilla frosting assortment of colourful candies of your choice. (We used red licorice vines, gummy bears, candy hearts, marshmallows and dots.)

With a small, child-safe utensil (plastic knife or spreader works well), frost the flat sides of graham crackers before constructing. Then layer bottom, top and side edges of cracker with frosting to help walls stand. (Hint: It also helps to put a line of frosting on the part of the plate where you plan to erect your sukkah.) Stick crackers to one another and the plate, carefully, pressing gently. The frosting will hold better with time as it hardens.

Gently layer candies onto or around the structure to your own design specifications. Sukkot are meant to be decorative, so the more colour the better! Take a picture, eat and enjoy! Builds 7-8 sukkot using 3-4 crackers per sukkah.

Not exactly quiet, but still...

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Three weeks after the last suicide bombing, as I write, it's clear that Israel has been showing more caution in its use of targeted killings of Hamas and Islamic Jihad leaders.

That's not to say that the government has backtracked from its decision to strike at those who carry out acts of terror and also at leaders of the terror organizations. But it seems the government is not interested in being seen by the public and by the world as being responsible for violating the "quiet" – which is not really quiet, neither on the Palestinian side nor the Israeli side, since there are targeted killings. Nevertheless, as of last Friday, three weeks have passed without any suicide bombings.

Things are also happening in Hamas. It has been several weeks since any Qassam rockets have been launched from Gaza, a fact that does not merit much attention because the firing of mortars from Gaza continues and has even intensified. Some people say Hamas has decided to suspend attacks against what the group itself calls "Israel within the 1948 borders," and to not strike at civilian targets.

Terror attacks in the territories will continue, since Hamas considers the settlers to be soldiers, not civilians. If what Hamas is saying is true, it can be seen as an interesting development, on the condition it heads in a positive direction. In the meantime, Hamas continues to smuggle arms, fire mortars from Gaza and attempt to smuggle explosives from Gaza to the West Bank via Israel.

Hamas, not only Israel, has no faith that the partial calm will not suddenly be shattered. Their leaders in Gaza are looking for hiding places for fear of a sudden targeted killing. Among other sites, they are looking for apartments in Gaza high-rise buildings. Evidently, they are relying on Israel to exercise caution and not do what Hamas does at every opportunity – intentionally target civilians.

Conversely, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's attitude toward acts of terror shows no change. Once again, there are numerous reports that aside from the diplomatic flag he is flying, Arafat is also bearing the flag of terrorist attacks against Israel. In so doing, he plays into the hands of the Sharon government. Were there to be a sudden large-scale terrorist attack while Arafat continued to disrupt the stabilization efforts of Ahmed Qureia's government after having already brought down Mahmoud Abbas' government, it's a virtual guarantee that the Israeli cabinet would take action against him, notwithstanding the UN General Assembly resolution calling on Israel not to do so.

One group of the Tanzim understands that if they do not prevent terror attacks, they will bring about Arafat's removal. But since the Tanzim have turned from a single organization into a cluster of armed gangs, it's all too possible the tone will be set by groups from Nablus and Jenin that have been penetrated by Hezbollah members with links to the Iranian Republican Guards.

The current reality – in other words, the evasion of implementing reforms or the fight against terror, and Arafat's continued rule – has frozen any chances for a renewal of negotiations. There is no chance the government of Israel will agree to talks with a leader that Washington, several European states and even some Arab states (albeit not publicly) consider the heart of the problem.

Washington would be prepared to push for a renewal of negotiations on the basis of the road map peace plan if it were persuaded the Qureia government had begun to fight terror, that it had real control over all the security agencies and groups, and that it was carrying out the reforms it's expected to implement.

Washington is no longer willing to show patience for Arafat, but even in regard to Qureia, Washington and road map co-sponsors (the UN, Russia and the European Union) are adopting a forceful tone.

This survey tells no lies

By SERGIO DELLAPERGOLA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The recently published results of the large-scale National Jewish Population Survey (NJPS) in the United States were expected to spark controversy. Such surveys are conducted every few years to provide the Jewish public with comprehensive data that about the direction of the community.

But in his article about the survey's results ("A Jewish Recount," New York Times, Sept. 17), J.J. Goldberg violated every rule, not only of professional criticism, but also of cultural discourse.

Goldberg is the editor-in-chief of the Forward, the famed Jewish weekly published in New York, and he is known for his anti-establishment attitudes. Beyond that, he has no professional training that might support his claims that "flawed figures" were published in the new survey or that the survey is the product of "ideology, ego [or] incompetence."

I choose not to discuss the power-driven skirmishes between Jewish community leaders who have opposing interests or the American Jewish media's role in these conflicts. It is more important to note that the technical advisory committee to the survey included first-rate scholars and people of integrity, such as the former president of the Population Association of America and the former deputy director of the U.S. Bureau of the Census.

The decline in the number of American Jews, from 5.5 million in 1990 to 5.2 million in January 2000, is not an absolute truth – due to the margins of error that are inherent in every statistical survey – but it is definitely a possibility in light of recent trends in Jewish demography and identity that can be seen in this survey and others conducted during the same time period.

The average number of children born to Jewish women between 40 and 44 years old is 1.9 – about 10 per cent below the minimum required for population replacement. And due to the increased intermarriage rate, the number of children raised in Jewish environments of any sort is much lower.

In a single decade, the median age of American Jews rose from 37 to 42. There is hardly any doubt that the mortality rate among American Jews is now higher than the percentage of children whose parents decide to give them any kind of Jewish identity.

According to another nationwide survey, the American Jewish Identity Survey released by the graduate centre of the City University of New York, there were 5.35 million Jews in the United States in 2001 – a figure that is also lower than this survey's 1990 estimate.

Besides the aging of the population, the second factor in the decline of the Jewish community is the decreasing desire of Jews to identify as such.

The surveyors found that 4.3 million Americans identify themselves as Jews – in addition to about 100,000 residing in institutions (old-age homes, prisons, etc.) and another 800,000 whose first answer to the question was that they had no connection to Judaism – but subsequently were found to be of Jewish descent.

Perhaps it was a mistake not to ask these 800,000 apathetic respondents if it was very important to them to be Jewish, or to ask them if they fast on the Fast of Esther. This might have revealed some interesting links between the margins of the Jewish community and the criteria needed to define Jewish identity. It may be assumed that in most instances, there would have been a lacklustre response.

It can therefore be argued – in contrast to what Goldberg wrote – that the survey's partial disregard of the marginal cases actually creates a more positive picture.

Another big disagreement concerns the intermarriage rate. According to the 1990 survey, 52 per cent of people who were raised as Jews and married between 1985 and 1990 married non-Jewish spouses. When one extracts from this calculation the "born Jews" who married non-Jews and also left Judaism, the figure drops to 43 per cent.

Which is the correct method of calculation? Each produces its own particular results. There is no question of errors or lies here – only of professional comprehension.

What happened, according to the survey, in January 2000?

If we also include in the calculation those Jews who have in the meantime converted to Christianity, we will find that the intermarriage rate rose in the last decade from 52 to 54 per cent, and if we don't include them (since they are, in any case, lost to Judaism), we find that the rate increased from 43 to 47 per cent.

What's more, the new survey raises an optimistic point about the Jewish community's improved ability to strengthen itself and keep its children within its embrace through educational initiatives. Indeed, the American Jewish population is not under threat of extinction.

Warnings of complacency – 30 years after Yom Kippur War

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

JERUSALEM — Thirty years after the traumatic Yom Kippur War, Israel's military superiority over the Arabs is greater than ever.

That, at least, is the assessment of Tel Aviv University's prestigious Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies. In its annual report, the think tank cites the quality of Israel's weapons systems and the U.S.-led victory in Iraq as reasons for a major strategic shift in Israel's favour.

But the report acknowledges that Israel still faces major threats from terrorism and non-conventional weapons.

And some analysts warn the report's talk of Israel's superiority and strategic gains could lead to the same type of complacency that cost Israel so dearly in the 1973 war, when it was caught unprepared by a joint Egyptian and Syrian attack and suffered heavy losses in the first few days of fighting.

After its initial setbacks, Israel's ultimate victory – the war ended only after the Soviet Union threatened to intervene to stop Israeli tanks from rumbling into Cairo and Damascus – was as impressive as its success in previous engagements with the Arab nations.

Still, Arab countries consider the war a victory, and many Israelis consider it a defeat of sorts – primarily because it punctured Israel's aura of invincibility after the 1967 Six-Day War.

The shock of the Yom Kippur War left deep scars on the national psyche that still affect Israelis today.

Foremost among them is a gnawing anxiety that the nation's leadership is so locked into a "conceptzia" – a shared strategic concept that determines their worldview – that they may be misreading reality and ignoring opportunities for peace. Some warn that the Jaffee Center's assessment reflects a similar, misplaced confidence.

Commenting on the report's claim that Israel is now better off strategically than ever before, the military analyst for Ma'ariv, Amir Rapaport, observed wryly that "the last time we boasted that things were never better was in the autumn of 1973."

One of the Middle East's main problems is its instability, Rapaport said. "What seems crystal clear today could change totally tomorrow," he warned.

The report highlights the fact that in Iraq, the United States and its allies needed just four military divisions to defeat 23 Iraqi divisions. That, the report says, drove home to the Arab states the huge disparity between the quality of modern Western armies and their own.

That has two major implications for Israel, the report says:

- By defeating Iraq, the United States wiped out the biggest Arab army in the Middle East and nullified the possibility of an eastern-front coalition of Iraq, Syria and Jordan, united against Israel;
- Since Israel has many of the same capabilities as the U.S. military – not just American or Western weaponry, but superior control-and-command systems, real-time intelligence gathering facilities and so on – the allied victory enhanced Israel's own deterrent posture.

Shlomo Brom, a former deputy head of planning in the Israel Defence Forces and one of the report's authors, notes that Israel's standing army is not only larger than the U.S. force used in Iraq, it has many of the same battle systems.

Therefore, he concludes, the one remaining eastern-front foe – Syria, which is weaker in land forces than Iraq was – "would have no chance in a military confrontation with Israel."

Brom says the war also helped Israel's strategic posture by enhancing U.S. deterrence, underlining the Arab world's fragmentation and increasing pressure on Iran, Syria and Hezbollah to stop fomenting violence against Israel and the West.

But the Jaffee researchers acknowledge that some of Israel's new strategic gains depend on whether the United States manages to stabilize Iraq or whether it gets bogged down. If the latter happens, some of Israel's gains could be wiped out, they say.

Still, Brom says the eradication of the eastern threat provides a rare opportunity to downsize the Israeli army. There is "a window of opportunity to review the IDF's real needs," he says.

Brom says the IDF should now be asking whether it really needs so many tank divisions. And he suggests that the IDF could save huge sums of money by shutting down production and development of Israel's own Merkava 4 tank, considered by many experts to be the most advanced in the world.

But the defence establishment remains unconvinced, arguing that scaling down land forces could encourage an enemy to attack. Thus, despite its cost and the cuts in next year's defence budget, the Merkava project is still on.

The Jaffee report suggests that, given the changed strategic situation, Israel should focus less on threats from conventional weapons and more on developing sophisticated methods to counter terrorism and unconventional warfare.

The second big issue for Israel is unconventional weapons. Ephraim Kam, Jaffee's deputy director, says Iran is only three to four years away from producing a nuclear bomb and is emerging as Israel's "next main problem."

Kam says Iran is not only closer than ever to nuclear capability, but there is a significant increase in Iran's involvement in terrorism against Israel.

Yoram Schweitzer, another Jaffee researcher, takes the point a step further, warning of the threat of terrorists armed with unconventional weapons.

The war in Iraq did nothing to advance the fight against international terror, he says. "Al Qaeda still has significant and proven capabilities of carrying out mass terror. But unless bin Laden the man is liquidated, Al Qaeda will not be defeated. And Al Qaeda could target Israel too."

Jaffee says Israel has 538 warplanes, nearly 4,000 tanks, 8,000 armoured vehicles, about 630,000 soldiers, 1,348 field guns and 236 helicopters.

Syria can more or less match this for size, but not quality. And Egypt, which also has Western weaponry, lacks Israel's sophisticated command-and-control and intelligence systems.

No end in sight

"I think our triumph is that we have succeeded in internalizing terror so that it does not overly affect our lives," said Justice Minister Yosef "Tommy" Lapid, in one of the week's rosiest assessments.

For the Palestinians, too, the year has resulted in few gains. Arafat was repeatedly maligned by the White House, and a new Palestinian Authority (PA) prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, contributed little to the Palestinian cause before bowing out.

Now the Palestinian issue has shifted to the back burner in Washington, as a result of the George W. Bush administration's preoccupation with Iraq, where the United States has to contend with its own "occupation."

Though many in the West continued to champion the intifadah as a "freedom movement," Palestinian terrorism has helped shift the Palestinian cause somewhat closer to Al-Qaeda in the eyes of some observers.

The PA's outgoing security minister, Mohammed Dahlan, says that change was not lost on him.

Considered a favourite of Washington but ousted in Arafat's latest government shuffle, Dahlan told the Associated Press this week, "We did not understand 9/11 in a correct and fundamental way that would have allowed us to help the national interest of our people, to bring back the international legitimacy of our authority."

Dahlan was a veteran of the first intifadah, which started in 1987 and lasted six years and had a much higher ratio of Palestinians dead to Israelis killed. Now there are three dead Palestinians for every Israeli killed, a startlingly low figure by the standards of most counterinsurgency campaigns.

While the PA's political and economic infrastructure is in shambles, many in the West Bank and Gaza believe they are prevailing.

Jailed Palestinian leader Marwan Barghouti says Palestinians have no alternative but to go on fighting.

"To die is better than living under occupation," he said in Tel Aviv district court last week in closing statements in his trial for complicity in 26 counts of terrorist-related murders.

Many Israelis believe not enough was done to keep Arafat to his Oslo-era pledge of renouncing violence.

French Jews mobilize opposition as Le Pen kicks off his campaign

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

French far-right leader Jean-Marie Le Pen's campaign for the leadership of a key region in southern France has local Jewish community leaders worried.

The problem, they say, is that Le Pen's National Front has a real chance of winning the first-round voting next March, which would lend legitimacy to Le Pen's anti-Semitic politics.

Launching his campaign aboard a boat in Nice's harbour two weeks ago, Le Pen said he would run for the presidency of the Provence-Alpes Côte d'Azur region – also known as PACA – an area with large Jewish communities in Marseille, Nice and other cities.

"This is not just a Jewish issue," said Zvi Amar, president of the Marseille Consistoire, a Jewish community group. "Le Pen threatens the whole of French society, not just the Jewish community."

Amar, a national vice-president of CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jews, said he doubts whether Le Pen could actually be elected president of the PACA region, but added that there is a strong possibility the far-right leader could top the polls in first-round voting, when a plethora of other candidates could divide the opposition vote.

"That would show the strength of the National Front base in the south of France, where the movement has had strong roots now for a long time," Amar said.

In the national presidential election last year, Le Pen got the most votes in the PACA region in first-round voting and more than a quarter of the votes in the region in the second-round runoff against incumbent President Jacques Chirac. Nationally, 18 per cent of voters cast their votes for Le Pen.

Le Pen, 75, is taking part in what may be his last major election fight, and the election represents a final chance to achieve legislative power in a region that has traditionally had a strong right-wing base.

With its large immigrant population, particularly in and around Marseille, the PACA region has given the National Front a platform to espouse its openly racist policies.

Marseille also is home to France's second largest Jewish community, at 70,000 people. The Jewish communities in Marseille, Nice and along the Côte d'Azur shoreline have not been targeted by National Front campaigns, but Le Pen's record of anti-Semitic statements is cause for alarm among the region's Jews.

Le Pen has described the Holocaust as a mere "detail in World War II history," has accused Chirac of being "in the pay of Jewish organizations" and has blamed Jews for erecting "invisible barriers within the French people."

In order to avoid division in the anti-Le Pen vote, Jewish leaders are urging candidates from small parties with minimal chance of victory not to run in places like the Provence region, asking them instead to lend their support to an agreed-upon centre-left candidate.

CRIF leaders raised the issue during a recent meeting with the Green party. A similar deal may be in the works with the centre-right Union for French Democracy.

That would leave Le Pen and Deputy Foreign Minister Renaud Muselier in a run against the incumbent president of the region, Michel Vauzelle of the Socialist party.

If all three qualify for the second-round runoff, Jewish leaders say the weaker candidate should withdraw.

"Only the strongest republican candidate should be allowed to run against Le Pen in the second round," said Clement Yana, CRIF president for the PACA region. "All republican votes should then unite to block Le Pen."

Whether or not French Jews can convince the candidates to go along with their scenario to block Le Pen is unclear.

The National Front has already had success in small towns in the south of France, with mayoral victories in Orange and the larger metropolis of Toulon. In each case, the National Front was able to play on a split in the opposition's vote in the second round.

Comedian brings Evil Dead to life in musical

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

George Reinblatt has turned comedy into a career, successfully crafting gut-busting lines for celebrities, comedy specials and musicals.

The 26-year-old Toronto resident is a hot commodity these days: he works at Montreal's Just for Laughs Comedy Festival as part of a writing team for guest celebrities such as Kelly Ripa, Howie Mandel, Rick Mercer and Joan Rivers; he played the warm-up comedian for the now-defunct CBC show Jonovision; and he wrote Evil Dead: The Musical, which returns to Toronto's Tranzac Club Oct. 16.

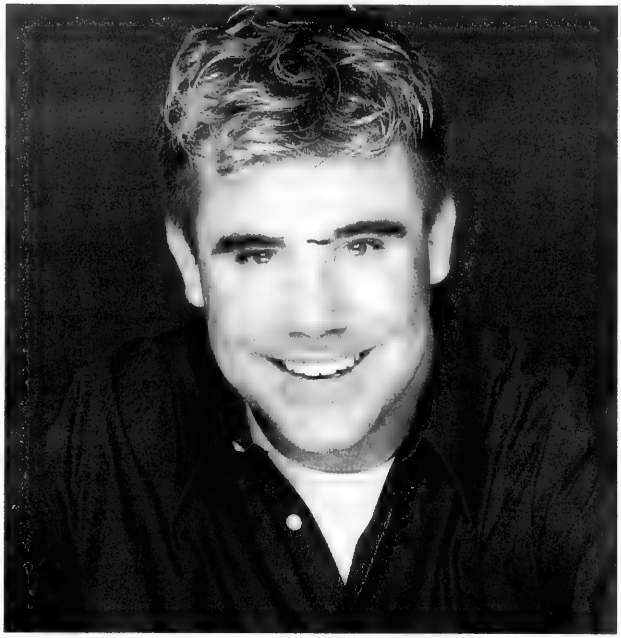
The satirical showing of the cult-classic Evil Dead films put Reinblatt's name in the Globe and Mail – bonus publicity, considering the musical sold out every night of its two-week run last August.

"There's been nothing like it," Reinblatt says about the reaction. Part of the show's appeal stemmed from its spoofs, although exaggerated horror screams and witty choruses attracted a large portion of laughs.

"I've always been a funny guy," he says. "But I'm still serious about writing funny stuff."

So it goes for comedy writers, who earn their living with wit and punchlines amidst deadline pressures. Before humour became his job, Reinblatt was a student at Queen's University. He would watch the school's cable access show Studio Q and yell at the screen, "This is awful!"

Deciding to do something about it, Reinblatt joined the show's writing team, shifting the news program into sketch comedy. The viewership skyrocketed, he says, and the taste of success inspired him to seek larger venues for his imagination.



George Reinblatt

His first job out of school was working as the "warm-up guy" comedy programs hire to excite the audience before the show begins. After doing that for the teen show Jonovision, Reinblatt decided he wanted to write. CBC recognized his talent and appointed him assistant to a scriptwriter.

"I have a TV mindset," he says.

But Reinblatt's dreams of TV shifted to a bigger venue, perhaps the Super Bowl of comedy writing: the Just for Laughs Comedy Festival. For the past two years, he and three other writers have written material for the celebrity hosts who grace the Montreal microphone. If you believe that Mandel or Mercer always write their own jokes, think again.

"We consider a comedian's style his voice," Reinblatt explains. "We try to fit the content with the personality."

Saturday Night Live regular Tina Fey, for example, trashed Canadian television during her cameo stand-up. Reinblatt says an audience expects that from Fay, "although she doesn't know so much about Canadian TV, which is where we come in."

In 2002, Reinblatt switched gears, and zombies and choruses became his summer fare when he collaborated with writer and director Christopher Bond on the script and music for Evil Dead.

"Evil Dead doesn't have boom-che jokes, but it's more of a vibe thing," Reinblatt says.

In other words, the satire ribs cheesy horror films and showy musicals. Song numbers include Look Who's Evil Now and Do the Necronomicon.

Rue-Morgue magazine, Canada's premier horror publication, praised the show: "Reinblatt delivers a powerhouse script chock-full of nods to the source as well as plenty of in-character extrapolations."

The humour is biting, with a heap of pop culture references to keep the audience's attention. While some lines fall flat, Reinblatt can't be blamed. After all, he says, "I'm the kind of guy who will laugh at stuff that no one's laughing at. And when everyone's laughing, I'm quiet."

After his success, does he want to cross the border to ply his trade in Hollywood, as most comedy writers do?

"I love it here in Canada," Reinblatt says. "Sure, I'd like for us to make better movies, but I appreciate Canadian TV and Canadian comedy."

Evil Dead: The Musical runs Oct. 16 to Nov. 2, tickets $20, at Tranzac Club. For ticket reservations, 416-723-EVIL (3845)

Critical documentary focuses on Dayan, Rabin and Sharon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Slaves of the Sword, History Television's three-part series on Israel, will be broadcast later this week, 30 years after the Yom Kippur War.

It's a critical exploration of three generals-turned-politicians who have played an enormous role in shaping Israel's destiny: Moshe Dayan, Yitzhak Rabin and Ariel Sharon.

Paul Jenkins' documentary, which will first be aired in back-to-back instalments starting Oct. 12 at 6 p.m., is serious and analytical. To be repeated individually on Oct. 13, 20 and 27, the smooth narrative is buttressed by interviews with family, friends, admirers and critics, as well as fascinating archival footage.

The title, however, is politically loaded. Due to Arab hostility, Israel has had to constantly defend itself. Is there any other country whose existence is perennially questioned and challenged? The title impugns the trio's motives and ignores their efforts to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict through diplomacy.

There are also factual mistakes and one major historical misinterpretation. Yet Slaves of the Sword, a British co-production with Canada's Alliance Atlantis Broadcasting, cannot and should not be dismissed as propaganda.

The episode on Dayan begins on a blustery note with a grinning Dayan stating there is "nothing more exciting than war." It is a misleading impression, conflating his macho inclinations with his genuine desire to come to terms with the Palestinians, as Slaves of the Sword itself acknowledges.

Dayan, who served as chief of staff and defence minister, shared David Ben-Gurion's bleak view that the Arabs were implacable enemies because Israel had "seized their land." But unspoken is the fact Israeli Jews have a historical right to Israel. They are not alien interlopers, as the French were in Algeria.

Dayan is portrayed as a daring but flawed soldier. He was complacent after the Six Day War, content with the territorial status quo. But his brilliant "Open Bridges" policy, which allowed the unhindered movement of Palestinians between the territories and Israel, lifted their standard of living, provided cheap labour to Israel, lowered Israel's profile as an occupying power and kept Palestinian nationalism in check for 20 years.

Yitzhak Rabin

Dayan did underestimate the military threat from Egypt and Syria. But it's not true Israel was caught "completely by surprise" in 1973. His reputation was irretrievably damaged by Israel's initial setbacks that year, but he salvaged his career by agreeing to be prime minister Menachem Begin's foreign minister.

Rabin fares better than Dayan in the documentary. Quiet and socially awkward, he was a brigade commander in the 1948 War of Independence. To open the besieged Jerusalem-Tel Aviv road, he ordered the evacuation of some 60,000 Arabs from Lod and Ramle. Today, it seems like an example of ethnic cleansing. Yet, in his memoirs, Rabin addressed the issue openly.

Though Dayan took credit for victory, Rabin prepared the armed forces for the Six Day War, and untainted by the ravages of the Yom Kippur War, he succeeded the discredited Golda Meir as prime minister. He saw the West Bank and Gaza as bargaining chips, but he gave in to settlers who sought to keep them under Israeli control.

For Rabin, the Oslo peace process was not just tactical. He understood the need for compromise, but also came to realize that the Palestinians, too, had a right to self-determination. He was seen as "a soldier in the army of peace," but he was also strategic and had a keen feel for harsh Mideast realities.

Emerging as the most controversial of the trio, Sharon comes across as disciplined and unruly, tender and tough. A clip of him shyly hugging his diminutive mother displays a soft side. But footage of him from the 1973 war with his head bandaged for the benefit of cameras shows a calculating person.

His meteoric rise to a generalship is duly charted. Wounded in the 1948 war, he achieved fame by commanding a 1950s strike force that carried out reprisal raids. As a general, he wiped out terror in Gaza and turned the tide in the Yom Kippur War. After leaving the army, he was instrumental in forming the Likud and in the building of settlements in the territories.

Also explored are Sharon's role in the war in Lebanon, his fall from grace after the Sabra/Shatila massacre, his hatred of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and his election as prime minister in the midst of the intifadah.

Near the end, an Israeli reporter cautions that Sharon's past may not be the key to his future. Food for thought.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5764, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the arts and literary community are reading.

Yiddish translator Miriam Beckerman reports that she's enthralled with No Star Too Beautiful, an anthology of Yiddish stories from 1382 to the present, edited and translated by Joachim Neugroschel (W.W. Norton).

"Ever since the book A Golden Treasury of Jewish Literature came out in the '40s, there hasn't been anything as good or all-inclusive as this," she said. "Most of the stories are 10 pages or less and it has a very good introduction.

"It's the kind of book that should be in every Jewish home because you can't read through all at once. You want to be able to pick it up from time to time. I just like the idea that I can open it anywhere at all and start reading."

The anthology offers selections by Canadian authors Yehuda Elberg, Rachel Korn and Chava Rosenfarb, Beckerman said. Her own translation of the Elberg story Kvitl is included in the upcoming 2003-04 edition of Parchment, due in November.

Toronto novelist Cary Fagan recently reread Moacyr Scliar's novel The Centaur in the Garden, one of two titles by the Brazilian writer that Toronto-based Key Porter has issued in translation from the Portuguese.

"I really loved it when it first came out years ago," Fagan said. "It's about a Brazilian who is born half-horse and half-human, and Jewish; it's about his family life in Brazil. Scliar is a fabulist, to a degree – he's got that South American magic realism thing. He's touching and funny and original."

Fagan is scheduled to interview Scliar on Oct. 31 at Harbourfront's International Festival of Authors. His novel The Mermaid of Paris was published recently by Key Porter.

The writing in Nancy Richler's Your Mouth Is Beautiful "is very clean and beautiful," says Toronto artist Rochelle Rubinstein, adding that the story – about a woman writing from prison to her daughter during Russia's revolutionary era – is compelling.

"The study of history through very personal description of someone's life is, to me, a great way to absorb the facts of history in a real, immediate way. I really enjoyed the descriptions of life in the Russian villages in the early part of the century and the emotional honesty about pain and sadness."

Some art works by Rubinstein are on view at the Lyndia Terre Gallery in Alton, Ont., until Oct. 26.

Toronto lawyer-novelist Morley Torgov read an excerpt of Jonathan Safran Foer's Everything Is Illuminated in the New Yorker, then went in search of the full novel (now a Perennial paperback).

"It's a very funny, brilliant story about a young Jewish American who travels to the Ukraine to trace his family background. He ends up with a Ukrainian interpreter who has learned English from the backs of cans of sardines. Every time he chooses a word from the thesaurus, he inevitably chooses the wrong one. It's a comic gimmick but it works brilliantly."

Torgov is putting the finishing touches to a new novel – "my first mystery suspense thriller" – titled An Hour to Kill. His early novel The Last Chance of Maximilian Glick was recently reissued by Raincoast Books.

Another Raincoast title – Karen X. Tulchinsky's The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky – has greatly impressed Toronto author Cynthia Holz.

The book taught her a lot about a dark chapter of Toronto's Jewish history, Holz said, and about the milieu of Jewish boxers. The story takes place in Toronto during the '30s and focuses on the infamous Christie Pits riot. The central character, Sonny Lapinsky, is a Jewish boxer.

"She did a wonderful evocation of the Kensington Market area in the '30s. I thought the characters were very strong and had a lot of heart. The writing was very forceful."

Holz's latest novel, A Good Man, was published by Thomas Allen earlier this year. She is due to read at the Toronto Jewish Book Fair on Nov. 16.

Adam Fuerstenberg

Adam Fuerstenberg, editor of the Jewish literary journal Parchment, has found much to appreciate in Montreal writer Joel Yanofsky's Mordecai and Me: An Appreciation of a Kind (Red Deer Press). According to Fuerstenberg, it's a sort of comic romp through Richler's stomping grounds in search of insight into the literary legend's background and character.

"The book is very funny and he has very good insights – he catches the double character of Richler," Fuerstenberg said. "It's not a biography but it tells an awful lot about Richler.

"The book is really chutzpahnik – it took real chutzpah to do this. Look at the title. But he pulled it off. He's having fun. He deserves a lot of credit."

The launch of the 2003-04 edition of Parchment is scheduled for Sunday, Nov. 16, 11 a.m. at the Miles Nadal JCC.

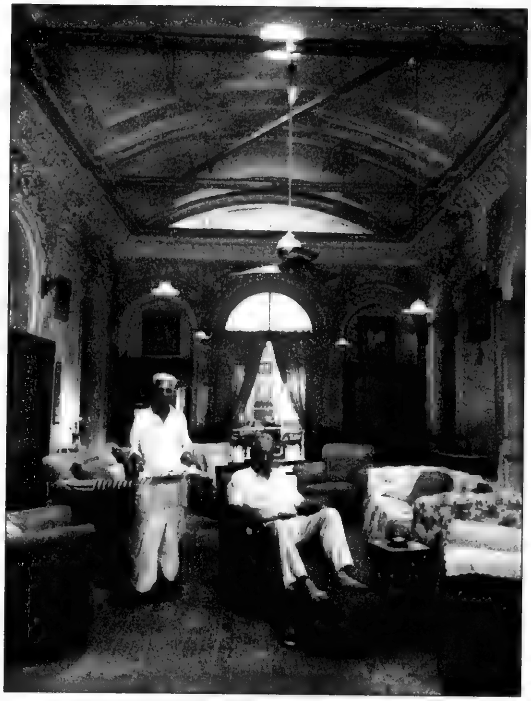
Diaspora distills the essence of Jews in the world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Frederic Brenner has been around the world and back photographing Jews in the Diaspora.

Diaspora: homelands in exile (HarperCollins), his two-volume book set, documents the complexity and richness of Jewish communities in 40 countries and five continents.



Indo-Jewish merchant Moses Elias in his home in Calcutta.

Brenner began his quest in 1983 in Morocco, Tunisia, Ethiopia and Yemen, driven by the prescient premise that the communities there were vanishing.

"I felt a desire and a responsibility to document these permutations of survival in exile before they disappeared," he writes. "Photography was simply a means to that end."

On his subsequent travels to the Soviet Union, Western Europe, southern Africa, Latin America and Asia, Brenner was surprised by the sheer diversity of the Diaspora.

"The more I progressed, the more I was forced to abandon the myth of 'One People.' I was searching for what I believed in: continuity. I found only discontinuity. And the more Jews I met, the less I understood what a Jew looked like."

Through Brenner's eyes, the Diaspora unfolds through the medium of 262 stark, astonishing black-and-white photographs and through the writings of essayists like Jacques Derrida and Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi.

A sampler:

In the Atlas Mountains of Morocco, Brenner catches up with several elderly Jewish pilgrims, all men, at the tomb of Rabbi David Moshe.

On a remote Russian communal farm, a bundled-up middle-aged Jewish couple and their young son pose for the camera. On the left side of the photograph, an old woman lies in a bed.

In the Greek city of Salonika, whose vibrant Jewish community was virtually wiped out during the Holocaust, four Jewish men, frowns on their weathered faces, display telltale Nazi concentration camp numbers on their arms.

Moses Elias, a seemingly self-satisfied Calcutta merchant, sits languidly in his enormous living room, attended by a servant holding a tray. The photograph summons up imperial India.

Travelling through Yemen, whose Jewish community has been vastly depleted by emigration, Brenner finds a wizened jeweller and his grandson, both wearing flowing robes and kipas.

And in a strange picture, Brenner photographs four marranos – secret Jews – celebrating Passover in an attic in Belmonte, Portugal. Clad in white, they resemble ghostly apparitions.

Jewish hawkers have been selling souvenirs in front of Rome's St. Peter's cathedral for as long as anyone can remember. Fourteen of them pose stiffly for Brenner, showing off their kitschy goods against the magnificent backdrop of palatial buildings.

These are but a few of the intriguing photographs Brenner has taken during his peregrinations throughout the length and breadth of the Diaspora.

As a testament to a scattered people, Diaspora is quite a statement.

Joint replacement surgery on the rise

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For more than 30 years, Zahavah Kleinert suffered from knee pain and swelling.

She used ice packs, had the knee drained, wore a knee support and had arthroscopic surgery and therapy. Through the years, she began to limp and her condition continued to deteriorate until she found the crippling, constant pain of arthritis and loss of cartilage unbearable.

Six months ago, after a long wait, the 70-year-old grandmother, who lives an active life – she maintains a career, participates in sports and is an avid gardener – had what is known as a total knee replacement.

Dr. David Backstein

"I can now live without pain," she said. "It is not an easy procedure. It requires a real commitment to post-operative physiotherapy, but I have been able to go back to most of my activities."

She added that she is grateful to her orthopedic surgeon, Dr. David Backstein of Mount Sinai Hospital, who performed the surgery.

She said he explained to her that he had cut away the ends of the effected bones and replaced them with parts made of metal. A smooth plate of polyethylene plastic was fitted between the metal ends to replace the cartilage. The knee cap was also replaced with a polyethylene plastic button.

"The new knee has given me a new life," she said.

Kleinert is one of a growing number of Canadians who are undergoing joint replacement. The Canadian Institute of Health Information (CIHI) reports that part of the dramatic increase can be attributed to an aging population, with people living longer and wanting to remain physically active.

And although genetics probably plays a role in a joint wearing out, there has been an increase in surgery among younger patients in recent years, particularly baby boomers who have pounded their joints with sports activities such as jogging, football and other impact activities.

An x-ray before a replacement

Recently released statistics from the Ontario Joint Replacement Registry show that upwards of 20,000 hip and knee replacements are done annually in Ontario, out of more than 40,000 annually in Canada.

An x-ray of a replacement

Susan Warner, managing director of the registry, said that although baby boomers and an aging population account for much of the increase in recent years, improved technology and better implants are also factors.

In an interview, Backstein said that total knee replacement surgery (TKR), which offers reliable treatment for osteoarthritis, "provides an excellent improvement in quality of life for patients and it is highly cost effective for society."

He says that when thinking of surgery, it is important to consider the risks and benefits to the individual patient. "In general, we prefer patients who are at least 50 years old."

Backstein, 34, graduated from the University of Toronto Medical School in 1993 and has completed seven years of orthopedic surgery residency. In 2001, he was appointed assistant professor of surgery at U of T and earned a faculty appointment at Mount Sinai Hospital. He has worked on hip and knee reconstruction, with his research focusing on minimally invasive techniques.

He is also one of four winners of a 2003 John N. Insall Travelling Knee Fellowship, sponsored by the Knee Society, which starts in October. The winners of the international competition – who hail from France, Japan, Austria and Canada – will travel for one month to internationally recognized joint replacement and knee surgery centres.

Backstein said current data shows that "the longevity of total knee replacement is 80 to 90 per cent at more than 20 years in properly selected patients."

He advises that after surgery, patients should continue their active lifestyles, including swimming, cross country skiing, walking, golf, light tennis and bicycling. Activities to avoid after knee surgery include impact aerobics, running, jumping and basketball.

"The key to recovery is exercising and a healthy lifestyle," Backstein said, noting the healthier a patient is before the operation, the faster their recovery.

Speaking about the long waiting lists for surgery due to increased patient demand, he said waiting time for surgery depends on the surgeon, location in Canada and the severity of a case.

There is a shortage of orthopedic specialists in Canada. As well, there are budget constraints, difficulty obtaining operating room time and access to anestethists, as well as hospital beds and equipment, Backstein said.

He advised patients not to wait until they are in serious pain before getting a referral from their family doctor to consult with an orthopedic surgeon. For less severely damaged knees, partial replacements are also possible.

BARRIE DRAGO
FESTI

CLOSING IN ON THE FINAL LAP:
One of the teams that participated in Barrie's first annual dragon boat race this past summer has raised $2,150 for Barrie's first Reform congregation, Am Shalom. The team of locals, the Aerarium Chain Gang, sponsored by the Aerarium Development Corporation, came in at eighth place in the race, which was held on Kempenfelt Bay. The synagogue, which is in Barrie's south end, is close to completion. Seen here is Stephen Sperling, president of Aerarium and Am Shalom, with boat race volunteers Vicky Sheppard (left) and Maxine Ashford.

Himelfarb continues career in junior after pro tryout

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — When Eric Himelfarb skated off the Corel Centre ice in Ottawa this September, the doors to a pro hockey career locked behind him, but he left camp with the hope of earning a fresh set of keys.

Himelfarb, 20, did not sign a contract with the Montreal Canadiens – the team that drafted him 171st overall in 2001 – after he didn't have a particularly good year with the Barrie Colts of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) last season.

He still led the team in scoring and played in the all-star game, but by not signing with the Habs, the Thornhill native became a free agent.

The OHL star knew he was lucky to be granted an amateur tryout with the Ottawa Senators, one of the league's top teams. Working hard this summer, Himelfarb whipped his body into top shape, preparing to battle for a contract in an organization stacked with talent. He was up against the likes of star prospect Jason Spezza, also 20, who played 33 games for the Senators last season.

"I went on a tryout and lasted a lot longer," Himelfarb said about making it out of rookie camp and into training camp. "I have no regrets. I played as hard as I could."

When he left the capital, his name still didn't appear on any dotted lines, but if you read between the lines of what a Senators assistant coach says, the keys are dangling in front of him.

"He was one of our better players throughout the rookie tournament," Senators assistant coach Perry Pearn said. "People are going to know that he had a very good camp. If he winds up back in junior and has a terrific year, it's just going to mean that somebody else is going to be willing to give him that opportunity."

Pearn said Himelfarb's explosive speed compensates for his small size (5-foot-11 and 165 pounds). During the rookie tournament against the Carolina Hurricanes and Canadiens, he scored and wooed crowds at the Corel Centre with nifty passes and the ability to make plays happen.

Even though the Senators took only 48 players into main camp, which is far fewer than teams usually invite, his efforts were enough to get him the unexpected nod. In camp, he suited up with NHL stars Marian Hossa, Daniel Alfredsson and Chris Phillips to try for a chance at what players call "The Show."

"Watching guys that almost won a cup last year, you're kind of in awe," Himelfarb said. The speed is much faster and the difference in play between the OHL and the NHL is tremendous, he added.

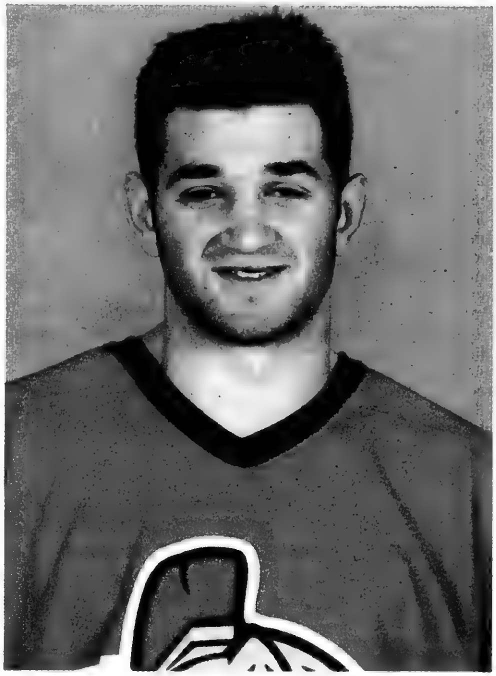
Wearing number 67, Himelfarb played for the white team in an intrasquad game. He centred a line between Senators regulars Vaclav Varada and Jody Hull.

Just minutes into the second period, he used his remarkable speed to pick up a loose puck at centre ice and walk in alone on net. After a little head fake, the known goal sniper missed the net wide right.

"It certainly would have helped him if he had finished off," Pearn said of the breakaway.

Himelfarb said he just couldn't get the puck up.

And while he's also known for his faceoff skills in the OHL, he had a tough time against NHL veteran Bryan Smolinski. Yet, on the first goal of the game, he won a faceoff draw back to Karel Rachunek, who fired a shot to score, giving Himelfarb the assist.



Eric Himelfarb

In the third, he skated into the corner with massive defenceman Zdeno Chara (6-foot-9, 260 pounds) who flattened him to the ice as the crowd gasped.

"Yeah, that didn't turn out too well for me. He [Chara] got the better of me," Himelfarb said, laughing.

Coach Pearn said going into the corner with Chara proved Himelfarb could battle and isn't afraid on the ice.

Pearn compared Himelfarb's story to that of Todd White, a small, quick player (5-foot-10, 194 pounds) who physically developed himself to get stronger. Pearn said White had been with two other NHL clubs (Philadelphia and Chicago) before catching on with the Senators – the type of journey Himelfarb might also take.

Himelfarb said he didn't do much socializing in Ottawa, but admitted he made a few trips to the casino over the river in Hull and went out with Spezza and goaltending prospect Ray Emery.

Himelfarb broke into the OHL as a fourth round pick of the Sarnia Sting. After three seasons in which he notched high scoring numbers, he was traded to Barrie in the summer of 2002. He had attended the Canadiens' rookie camp in September 2001.

After getting cut by the Senators this summer, he had the option of playing in the East Coast Hockey League, but instead chose to play for the OHL's Kingston Frontenacs, a team that obtained his rights after a trade with Barrie.

He knows he'll be watched and must shine to keep the keys in sight.

Sukkot: A sacred journey

something

By JODI KOVITZ

When I was little, I looked forward to Sukkot every year. There was something wonderful about making streamers out of construction paper to hang in the sukkah. There was also something really special about sitting around the little hut with all of my tiny friends drinking apple juice out of minuscule cups. I always found myself incredibly sad when the sukkah came down.

During Sukkot, we build a sukkah to recall the portable shelters our ancestors used on their journey from servitude in Egypt to the hope of a better life in the promised land of Israel. For some of us, the practice might have traditional or historical significance. For others, it might be more spiritual, as a means of coming back to God or having His presence lead us to a better place.

For us 20-somethings, Sukkot might also be seen as representative of the movement in our lives. As a 25 year old, I am very comfortable drinking apple juice out of a tiny cup in my parents' house. I am safe here, and I am incredibly appreciative of the direction and support they provide as I make difficult decisions. I am comfortable in my blue living room and I am sad to leave it when the time comes, just as I am sad when the sukkah comes down.

But another part of me so badly wants to be in my own modest house, sipping wine rather than juice, continuing to make choices away from the safety of my childhood home and constant parental support.

Like a portable shelter or sukkah, that support might offer some protection, but not complete coverage as we move during our 20s from the safety of childhood to the unknown of adulthood. We face many questions about our relationships, careers and belief systems and how to practise and incorporate religion and/or spirituality into our lives. Due to our lack of experience in making adult decisions, we make our choices both confidently and tentatively. We feel grounded yet uprooted. We attempt to build stability, yet everything is shaky.

I have spent several years working through the process of figuring out who I am, who I want to be and what it will take to get me there. While this process is incredibly difficult, it has been extremely rewarding thus far. What I have learned is that it is only through the actual journey or processes of making difficult choices, that I have overcome my initial feelings of vulnerability and fear that accompany being a 20-something.

To me, Sukkot represents the beauty of the difficult journey into adulthood. It is wonderful to learn to trust yourself as you make difficult choices. It is hard to choose a career direction because there are so many. It is hard to pick a form of Judaism that is comfortable – because again, there are so many different Jewish options. It's the same with choosing a life partner – how do you know for sure?

But it is the process of trying on different hats that really matters. We will all make some great choices and some mistakes. But we will eventually learn to trust our judgment as we develop our priorities, ethical frameworks and life goals. It is the process of developing ourselves that is truly sacred.

If the ancient Israelites could have been flown first-class from Egypt to Israel, would we, as Jews in the Diaspora, treasure Israel and what it represents as much as we do today? I honestly don't think so. I wish you all a wonderful journey.

I welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

SWEET DREAMS SOUP
(Cream of Carrot Soup with Ginger)

1 small potato, peeled & chopped
2 tblsps. margarine
1 small leek, chopped (1 to 1½ cups)
2 large carrots, finely chopped
1/2 tsp. grated fresh ginger
or 1/2 tsp. curry
1/4 tsp. thyme
1/8 tsp. nutmeg
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/2 stalk celery, chopped
2 1/2 cups milk

Boil potato in 2 cups water about 15 mins. Drain, save broth and set potato aside.

Melt margarine in soup pot on med. heat. Add leek, half the carrots, the ginger, thyme, nutmeg, salt and pepper. Sauté for 5 mins. Add celery, the remaining carrots, cooked potato, and potato broth. Add 1 cup water, and stir. Bring to a boil, then reduce heat and simmer, covered, about 20 mins. In a blender or bowl, blend or mash 2 cups of the soujp with the milk until thick and silky smooth. Return the blended soup to the soup pot, and stir.

Ladle into bowls and garnish. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

Epi on Education

Living Sukkot

Seymour Epstein

The sukkah is a mixed metaphor if there ever was one. On the one hand, it is a place of refuge and peace, sukkat shalom; and on the other, its frailty illustrates our vulnerability. This is especially true in the Canadian climate where rain (and even snow) can prevent us from using this temporary dwelling during the festival of Sukkot.

How do we teach this mixed message to young children? Do we shelter our students from the tension inherent in such a symbol by merely teaching about the holiday or do we expose them to this reality of our tradition by living the festival?

In this case, there is no better teacher than the holiday itself. It is probably no accident that in most Diaspora Jewish schools, the festival's intermediate days, Chol Hamoed, are not school holidays, while in Israel they are. In Israel, every street sings out Sukkot, with apartment verandahs and parking lots sprouting little huts, or men walking to and from the synagogue with lulav and etrog in hand.

Also in Israel, the vulnerability inherent in a harvest festival is even more apparent than here, depending on how much rain fell the year before. In Canada, it is less evident (except on certain parts of Toronto's Bathurst Street!), and the school must provide what the street lacks.

But even in school, Sukkot itself is its own best teacher. Living the holiday through prayer, song, the lulav and etrog, eating in the sukkah, studying in the sukkah – these are the best ways for children and adults to appreciate the mixed messages, the tension and the ultimate joy of this joyous festival.

The message of Sukkot that teaches us simchat hachag (the joy of the festival) – even when times are not so happy – is best learned by living the holiday, not by studying it.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

SPOTLIGHTING Our Talent!

Dr. Irene Andrulis

Statistics show that since 1988, breast cancer incidence rates have risen by 10%. Dr. Irene Andrulis is working hard to find ways to lower that figure. As a molecular geneticist and Senior Investigator at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital, Dr. Andrulis's research focuses on the molecular alterations in cancer and how these genetic events can contribute to human cancers. Knowing this information can help doctors better predict an outcome for people with breast cancer or sarcoma.

"Despite intense research efforts, much remains to be determined about the development and progression of events leading up to cancer," says Dr. Andrulis. "Through molecular genetic research we hope to gain a better understanding of the processes involved in the development of breast cancer so that ultimately the disease can be prevented and the changes that occur during progression so that targeted therapies can be developed."

Dr. Andrulis holds the position of Co-Head at the Fred A. Litwin Centre for Cancer Genetics and Scotiabank Scientist at Mount Sinai and is a Professor in the Department of Medical Genetics and Microbiology at the University of Toronto. She is also the Director of the Ontario Cancer Genetics Network. She is the recipient of numerous awards and scholarships and has authored many papers in the area of breast cancer research.

A frequent speaker at many events, Dr. Andrulis is one of the featured speakers at the upcoming Dialogue on Breast Cancer Lecture. See upcoming events for more information.

OPENING DOORS TO BETTER PATIENT CARE

On September 4th, staff and friends of Mount Sinai Hospital gathered to celebrate the official opening of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building. The building is named for Joseph and Wolf Lebovic, in recognition of their generous $10 million donation.

The building which is located behind the Hospital on Murray Street is home to a variety of research and patient care facilities that include the Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre, the Rebecca MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease, the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes, and the Ellen and Martin Prosserman and Family Centre for Health Research.

These clinics bring together clinicians and researchers in a unique environment that is a model of patient care for the 21st century. By housing clinical research and patient care together, research is stimulated by patient needs and results are quickly applied to patient care.

JOSEPH AND WOLF LEBOVIC BUILDING

Joseph and Wolf Lebovic cut the ribbon to formally open the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building.

Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes

On September 23rd, friends and staff were thrilled to officially celebrate the opening of the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes. The Centre was funded by Leadership Sinai, a group of young business and professional leaders dedicated to ensuring the future success of Mount Sinai Hospital. Since 1993, Leadership Sinai has made significant contributions to support research, enhanced patient care, new technology and equipment.

At the opening Dr. Zinman stated that diabetes is one of the fastest growing global epidemics and is expected to affect 280 million people worldwide by the year 2025. The Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes is an answer to this epidemic by providing a facility that focuses on both patient care and research. The new Centre was designed with the patient in mind: Waiting rooms are less crowded and patient services are more abundant. It also provides a dynamic environment for research - ultimately meaning better outcomes for patients as scientists discover how to prevent, control and reduce the complications of diabetes.

Dr. Bernard Zinman and Annette Barnie show Gary Fogler, past chair of Leadership Sinai the new test room, where diabetes patients participate in ongoing diabetes research projects.

From L to R: Gary Fogler; Dr. Bernard Zinman, Director, Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes; Sam and Judy Pencer Family Chair in Diabetes; and Annette Barnie, Clinical Research Coordinator.

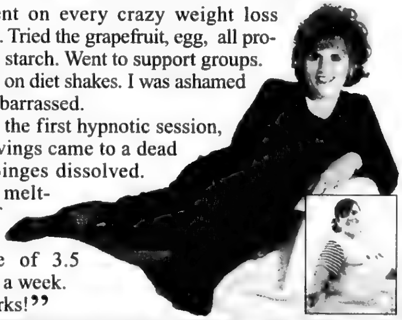
Want to lose weight for your next wedding?

You can buy a new dress. You can get a great hairdo. Great. But they can't hide what lies beneath. Are you ready to make a real, lasting POSITIVE CHANGE?*

Stacey Harrington lost 49 pounds in 5 months

"I noticed a change in my eating habits after my first session ... I've thrown out all my fat clothes. I have not been paid to write this. I believe in hypnosis. It's given me my life back."



Pat Carley lost 105 pounds

"I went on every crazy weight loss scheme. Tried the grapefruit, egg, all protein, all starch. Went to support groups. Starved on diet shakes. I was ashamed and embarrassed.

After the first hypnotic session, my cravings came to a dead stop. Binges dissolved. My fat melted off at an average of 3.5 pounds a week.

It works!"

Nancy Greenberg lost 20 pounds in 6 weeks

"For an entire year, I avoided going out. I dreaded parties and wore tent dresses. I had tried all the fad diets. My weight always came back. I was tired of counting calories.

At Positive Changes, there was no pressure whatsoever. I lost 20 pounds in 6 short weeks. My dress size plunged from a tight 14 to a sleek size 9.

Don't carry around that unwanted weight or stress any longer."

Memories Begin Here

Be Part of Tradition

Weddings have been part of the Estates of Sunnybrook for almost three-quarters of a century. Thousands of couples have chosen to celebrate their special day at the elegant Vaughan Estate, McLean House or the Coach House.

Vaughan Estate
Elizabethan Elegance

J.J. Vaughan, the original owner, started the tradition of weddings at Vaughan Estate, then known as Donningvale. Today, Vaughan Estate is newly restored and refurbished yet retains all the original heritage character. The signature rooms at Vaughan Estate can hold a reception for up to 160 guests and the Wedding Arbour on the Estate's grounds is quite simply the ideal location for your outdoor ceremony.

McLean House
Georgian Grace

From lush, manicured gardens to elegant rooms with a view, McLean House provides everything for the ideal ceremony and reception. Originally known as BayView and dating to 1929, McLean House offers a selection of signature rooms, each one decorated to reflect the style and ambience of this graceful Georgian manor.

Coach House
A Very Special Place

For couples wishing a more intimate wedding, the Coach House offers the perfect venue for up to 40 guests.

We're Here To Help

From the traditional to the original, our team is here to help you plan the wedding of your dreams. Specializing in exceptional personalized service, the Estates' wedding team is committed to ensuring that your day is exactly how you imagined it.

By choosing the Estates, you know that your investment in your wedding is directed towards furthering vital research at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

NOVOTEL Hotels
The Perfect Place for all your Wedding Needs

It is known within the Jewish Community of Toronto North York that when looking for hotel accommodations, there is no better hotel than NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK.

Located next to Mel Lastman Square, in the heart of the entertainment district of North York and with direct indoor access to Toronto's extensive subway system your guests' will be able to enjoy the many wonderful attractions Toronto has to offer all over the city. Plus, for those guests looking to partake in a relaxing holiday experience there is always a wide variety of restaurants featuring culinary delights from all over the world and endless shopping areas showcasing the latest fashion trends and entertainment attractions within steps of the hotel.

But, what many of you are not aware of, is how perfect the hotel is for all your wedding needs.

NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK understands that your wedding is a time for everyone to celebrate. It is a time for you to enjoy this very special moment. It is a time for you to be provided with memories that will last a lifetime. That's why at NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK, your highly dedicated, experienced and professional catering coordinator will handle each and everyone of your details from start to finish. From planning the engagement party and wedding celebration; organizing special hotel rates and festivities for your out-of-town guests; to arranging your own wedding night accommodations, NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK is here for you.

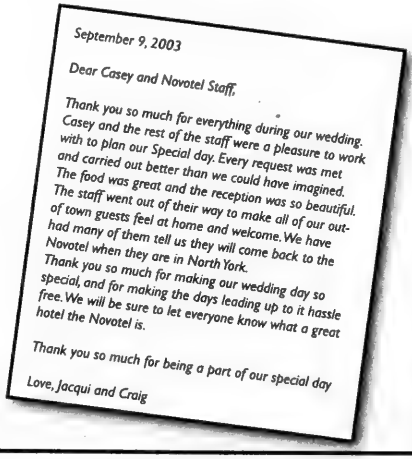
Whether it be a small and intimate celebration for 50 people or a larger spectacular dancing event for up to 200 people, NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK has it all. At NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK you are guaranteed to take advantage of the private floor of the hotel with a newly renovated reception area, as well as, the intimate Gibson Ballroom featuring a magnificent view of the Gibson House Museum grounds. You will be treated to a wonderful cuisine catered to the tastes of each and everyone of your guests. Novotel's catering professionals make planning every event a joy of its own. There is no better place to celebrate a wedding than at NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK.

Tips for Planning the Perfect Wedding at NOVOTEL TORONTO NORTH YORK

- Call Casey Savlov directly at the Novotel Toronto North York hotel to check dates for Hotel availability for all wedding events
- Arrange a meeting to tour the hotel facilities.
- Request a personalized wedding package that meets your needs (budget, number of guests, number of meal courses, etc…)
- Inquire about the many different companies Novotel Toronto North York has worked with for Invitations, Photography/Pictures, Decorations, Wedding Planners, Transportation/Limousines, Wedding Cakes, Floral Arrangements, Disc Jockey Services, Live Music, Entertainment, etc…
- Secure the hotel space for all requirements with a signed contract and provide the necessary deposits required.

  Hint: the more events secured at one time, the better leverage you will have with price negotiations (engagement party, out of towner events, hospitality rooms, hotel group rates, and more)
- Note all due dates for menu selections, guaranteed numbers, floor plans, and payments. This way you will be able to concentrate on other areas, and you will not have to worry about last minute deadlines.
- Arrange a time to meet your on-site event contact and review final plans at least 2 weeks prior to event date.
- Sit back, relax, and get ready to enjoy one of the most memorable events of your life. Let Novotel Toronto North York do the work for you.
- Go on the Honeymoon!

Testimonial from one of our Recent Brides



September 9, 2003

Dear Casey and Novotel Staff,

Thank you so much for everything during our wedding. Casey and the rest of the staff were a pleasure to work with to plan our Special day. Every request was met and carried out better than we could have imagined. The food was great and the reception was so beautiful. The staff went out of their way to make all of our out-of town guests feel at home and welcome. We have had many of them tell us they will come back to the Novotel when they are in North York. Thank you so much for making our wedding day so special, and for making the days leading up to it hassle free. We will be sure to let everyone know what a great hotel the Novotel is.

Thank you so much for being a part of our special day

Love, Jacqui and Craig

We invite you to celebrate in a new world full of charm and elegance.

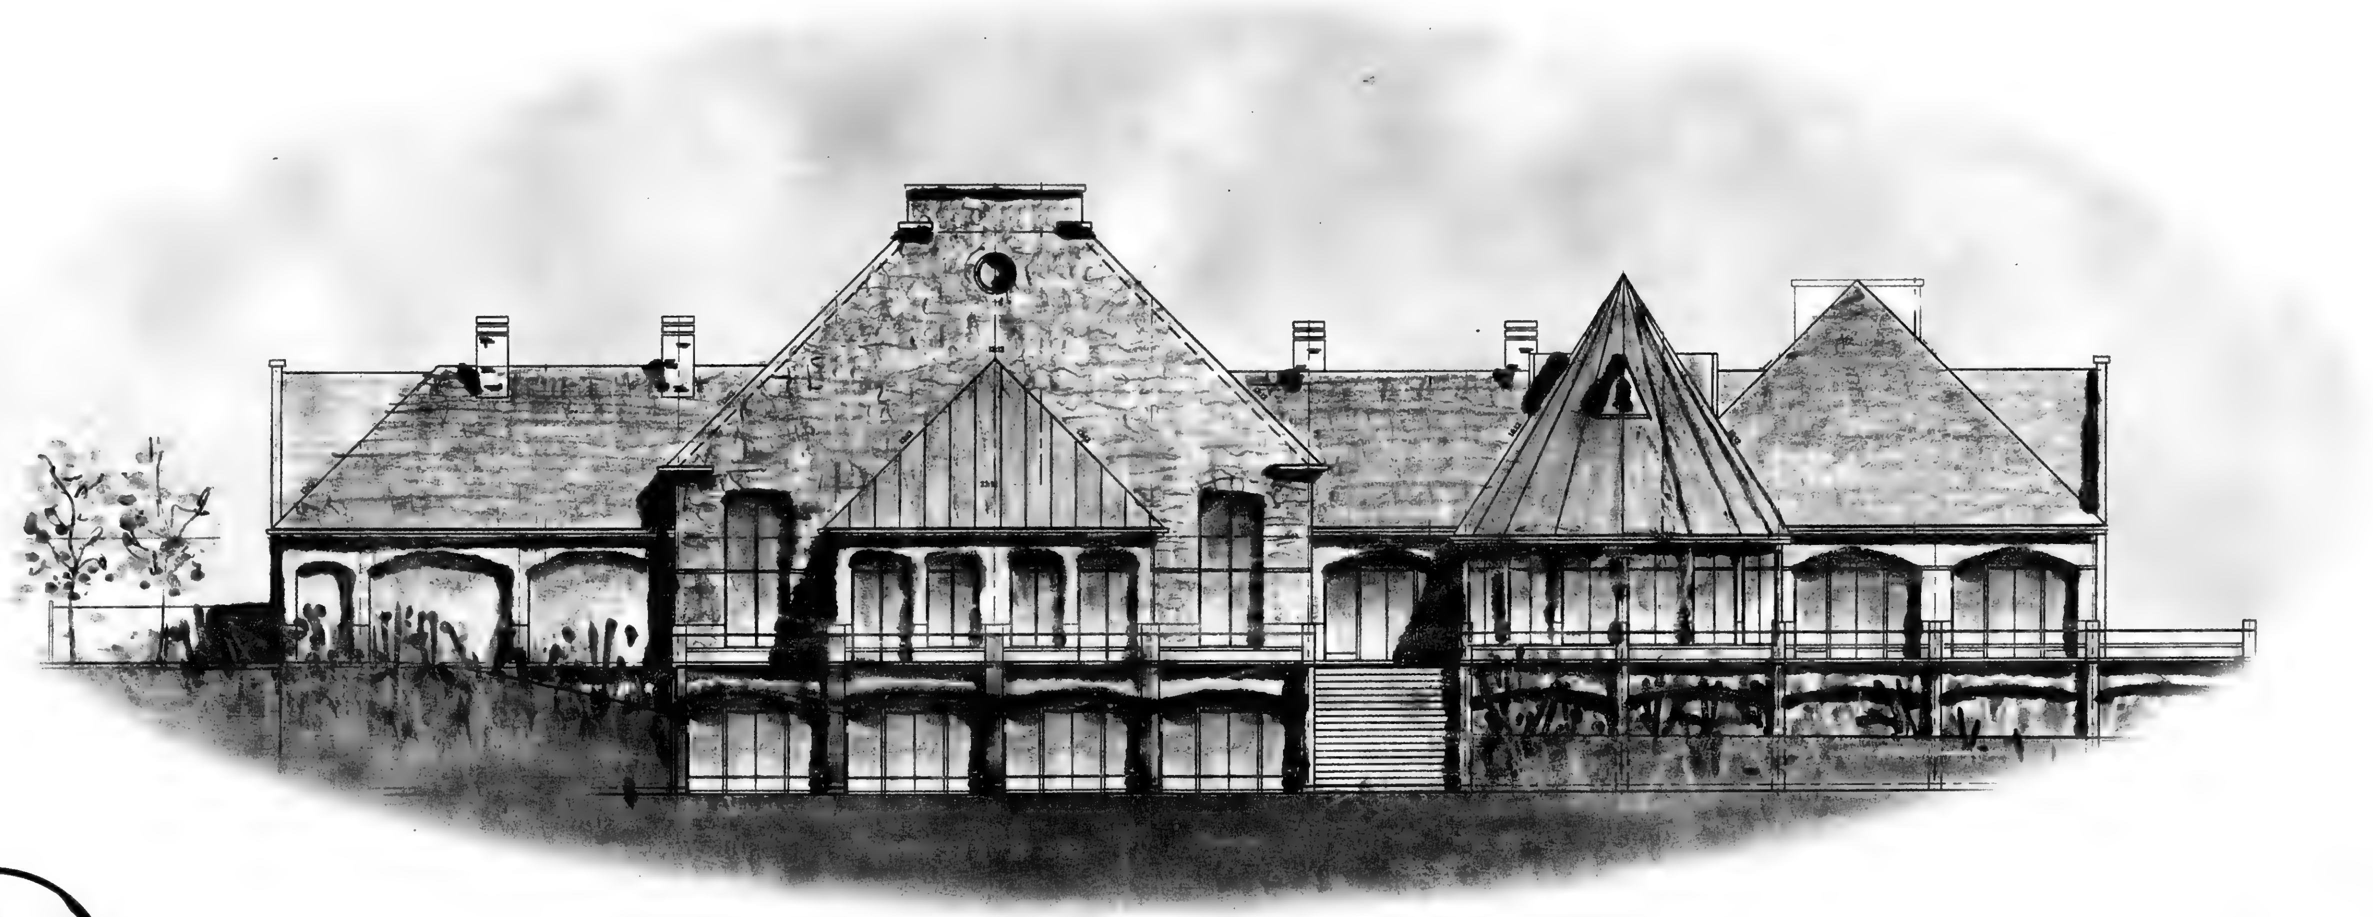
Your simcha at Copper Creek: a match made in heaven



COPPER

Canada's finest Kosher caterers, in a most spectacular setting. What more could a wedding want?

Imagine serving up to 400 guests on grounds with glorious landscaped gardens, an expansive terrace, and raised gazebo. This isn't just a venue; it's paradise.

Care to step inside? Our lavishly elegant, copper-roofed clubhouse with floor-to-ceiling windows and octagonal atria will seat these same 400 guests comfortably.

Setting? Nestled in the Humber River Valley in picturesque Kleinburg, just 30 minutes from downtown Toronto, overlooking a championship golf course.

There's no better place to set the stage for happy-ever-aftering. Call us at 905.893.3370 and we'll be happy to have a leading Kosher caterer arrange a taste extravaganza to equal the visual feast. It's a match made in heaven.

Give your once-in-a-lifetime event the treatment it deserves: Copper Creek.

It's An Occasion, so make it special

Raizelle Serebrowski has owned and operated It's an Occasion Catering & Gourmet Foods for five years. Her experience goes back further, though; and her love of food preparation goes back as far as she can remember. Many of the recipes she teaches her staff today, are long-standing personal favourites.

A former teacher of religious studies, Serebrowski catered her four sons' bar mitzvahs for fun. Her friends urged her to make catering a business. She did, privately at first; then in 1998, she founded It's an Occasion.

Serebrowski is proud of the feedback she gets from many of her clients. "We get a lot of unsolicited thank-you notes," she says. Most of her business comes either from word of mouth, or from people who were guests at an event she catered.

Because It's an Occasion is not a huge company, Serebrowski is able to maintain that personal touch that is missing from the larger companies. "Our good name keeps our plate full," Serebrowski says.

At It's an Occasion, quality ingredients, preparation and personal service are standard fare. "I don't just want to meet your expectations," Serebrowski states: "I want to surpass them."

Until recently, It's an Occasion was only dairy and vegetarian. But now, through B'nai Torah, they are able to cater meat dishes as well. While they still have their 596 Marlee location; the B'nai Torah social hall is available for rental.

There's no kind of catering It's an Occasion doesn't do. You name it, they do it: Weddings, bar or bat mitzvahs, shivah meals, etc. And you can order in bulk. They will work at either of their two locations, in your home, or at other venues. And they will look after other aspects of your event, like wait staff and rentals.

It's an Occasion offers a chocolate fountain for kosher events; and they often supply other kosher caterers with sweet tables. They issue new menus four times a year; but what they offer is too diverse to encompass in a few pages. They will also customize a menu for you.

Make your event special: choose It's an Occasion Catering & Gourmet Foods. Call Raizelle Serebrowski for an appointment, at 416-785-0996; or the B'nai Torah synagogue office at 416-226-3700.

Izzy Asper: philanthropist and renaissance man

CanWest Global founder was 71

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Israel "Izzy" Asper, one of the most outspoken and influential figures in the fields of business, media and philanthropy, died last week after collapsing at his Winnipeg home. He was 71.

A larger-than-life figure who was remembered as a renaissance man for his diverse interests, Asper headed an international media empire that grew out of a single TV station in Winnipeg. He was also remembered for his devotion to the State of Israel and his conviction that the lessons of historic anti-Semitism and racism should not be lost on a new generation of Canadians.

The son of immigrant parents who ran a small movie theatre in rural Manitoba, Asper went on to create the CanWest Global Communications media empire with interests in the newspaper and television businesses in Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

A tax lawyer by profession, he also maintained a lifelong interest in jazz music, establishing a jazz radio station in Winnipeg and promoting concerts by top performers in his hometown.

One of the wealthiest men in Canada, Asper was also renowned for his generosity, funding numerous Jewish and non-Jewish charities.

A hard-headed businessman and risk-taker who was not averse to settling disputes through litigation, he was known for his sense of humour, his concern for the less fortunate and for his down-to-earth character.

In his later years, as he handed over management of CanWest Global and his charitable interests to his children, Leonard, Gail and David, Asper focused on his latest pet project, the creation of a Canadian Museum of Human Rights, which he envisioned would be a world-class facility that would bring researchers and students to Winnipeg from around the world. Before that, Asper underwrote a unique program that let hundreds of Manitoba youngsters travel to the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., to learn about the genocide that claimed the lives of six million Jews.

The human rights museum project was one of many investments he made in his hometown of Winnipeg, which made him one of the city's most beloved figures. He refused to leave Winnipeg for the larger corporate centres in other parts of Canada.

In April 2000, Asper posed next to the first camera that his television station CKND used in 1975.

Security fence is a bold step for Sharon — please see page 37

The News in Brief

CANADA

Day Confronts Moussa

OTTAWA — Canadian Alliance foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day lectured Amre Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, on freedom of the press in an argument earlier this month after Moussa testified before the House of Commons foreign affairs committee. The heated exchange between the two began during Moussa's testimony and continued after the meeting. "This wall to be built in the occupied territories, is it justice? Is it fair?" Moussa asked Day, referring to a decision by Israel to extend a security fence around Jewish communities in the West Bank. As the men stood toe to toe, Moussa noticed three print journalists and one TV reporter recording them. "I am not making an interview," he said, glaring at a reporter. "We don't mind freedom of the press," Day told him. "Yes, freedom of the press is there, but when there are rules," Moussa replied as he motioned to the committee table behind him. "I am not going to answer because I am not making an interview." Day, responded, "We just allow freedom of the press. We're used to it."

ISRAEL

Iranian Hackers Foiled

JERUSALEM — Iranian hackers have tried to break into the Israel Electric Corporation's computers and disrupt Israel's power supply several times in recent months, Ha'aretz found. The hackers, some of whom may be university students, sought to damage the systems that run Israel's power stations, by sending viruses and trying to overload servers in a "denial of service" attack. The utility managed to detect the attempts and foil them without damage to the power system. Shin Bet's information security agency traced the hackers to Iran and some of the viruses to computers in Iranian universities.

Wrestler Wins Gold

JERUSALEM — Israeli wrestler Gocha Ziziashvilly returned home with a gold medal from the Greco-Roman World Championships, held Oct. 4 near Paris. He beat Swede Aza Abrahamian 2-0 in overtime in the 185-pound final.

WORLD

New Count of Jews

MOSCOW — There are 259,000 Jews in Russia, according to an unofficial overview of the 2002 national population census from the Novoye Izvestiya newspaper. The last census, conducted in 1989 when the U.S.S.R. still existed, counted 551,000 Jews in what is now Russia. The new data says more than 78 per cent of Russian Jews live in Moscow or St. Petersburg.

Nobel for Russian Jew

MOSCOW — Russian Jewish scientist Vitaly Ginzburg, 87, has been awarded the 2003 Nobel Prize in physics "for pioneering contributions to the theory of superconductors and superfluids," the Nobel committee said. He shares the prize with another Russian, Alexei Abrikosov, now working in the United States, and British-born Anthony Leggett. Ginzburg is affiliated with Moscow's Lebedev Physical Institute.

FBI Funded Hamas

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The FBI funnelled up to $5,000 (US) to Hamas in 1998 to track how funds reach terror groups. Using an Arizona businessman, the FBI was trying to see whether cash earmarked for charities was funding terror. The man, a convert to Islam who later fell out with the FBI – which confirmed the cash transfer – said as far as he knew, the cash went to charitable groups. Israel was told of the operation, which was curtailed without any prosecutions, Associated Press reported.

Rabbi Oshry Dies

NEW YORK — Rabbi Ephraim Oshry, who helped Jews live religiously during the Holocaust, died in New York Sept. 28 at age 89. Rabbi Oshry held secret services and was a scholar who answered Jews' theological questions in World War II while living in the Kovno Ghetto. After the war, he published notes taken during that period, winning two National Jewish Book Awards for his writings. Rabbi Oshry also set up yeshivot in Rome, Montreal and New York.

Man Targeted for Pro-Israel Bumper Sticker

CALGARY — Two carloads of young men tried to run the head of a grassroots pro-Israel lobby group off the road, and berated him with anti-Semitic and anti-Israel statements in an early-morning incident last month.

Randy Shapiro, a lawyer and president of the group Stand with Israel, was driving through downtown Calgary on Sept. 1 at about 1:40 a.m. when a car carrying five men "tried to swerve into me, basically trying to cut me off, and [they] gave me the finger," he told the Jewish Free Press.

Shapiro said at first he thought the men, whom he believes were Arab, were upset about his driving, but he soon realized that a small Israeli flag on his rearview mirror and his "I Love Israel" bumper sticker had attracted their attention.

As his car slowed down, Shapiro said, a second car with four young men approached and also tried to swerve into his car. He came to a stop and when he tried to drive away, the car drove toward him. The young men in the car were yelling at Shapiro, saying things such as: "You stupid fucking Jew. I'm going to kill you," and "Palestine forever."

Eventually, Shapiro found his cellphone and made it clear he was calling for help. He recorded the licence number of the second car and police are investigating. He also received a tip about the identity of the second car's driver and has named him and his passengers in a civil suit he has launched.

Shapiro said the head of the Muslim Council of Calgary called him to express regret over the incident. "I'm not easily intimidated, but this experience shook me up," Shapiro said.

Toronto mayoral hopefuls square off in debate

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Toronto's top mayoral hopefuls squared off last week before a Jewish audience, with each offering his or her vision of a city free of debt, out-of-control spending, high taxes and turmoil over services.

Barbara Hall, Tom Jakobek, David Miller, John Nunziata and John Tory appeared on a panel before about 500 people at the Four Seasons Hotel in an event organized by the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Toronto's realtors cabinet.

All the candidates appeared sympathetic to concerns raised by CJC over the high cost of security at Jewish day schools and synagogues during the High Holy Day period.

While none had a specific plan to deal with the issue, all believed the Jewish community should not have to foot the bill on its own to protect its members.

The rule of law

From the editor's desk

The not-yet-minted Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), a new community umbrella organization, is still a work in progress (See the front-page article in The CJN's Oct. 9 issue, "Advocacy agencies restructured").

CIJA has not yet decided upon the organizational structure that it is hoped will ultimately combine autonomy with accountability for the Canada-Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress and a new national campus agency. The nature of that structure should unfold in the coming months.

Nevertheless, CIJA sponsored its first official event last week, a special dinner meeting with Prof. Emanuel Gross of Haifa University, who is a visiting professor this semester at Osgoode Hall Law School.

The guests in attendance included senior members of the bench and bar, government policy-makers and advisers. They came to hear an Israeli perspective on the rule of law and terrorism.

Gross is uniquely qualified to offer that perspective. He served in the Israel Defence Forces for 25 years, culminating in the presidency of the military tribunal of the southern command. He has published extensively on the many confounding legal questions that arise for a democracy when it faces terrorism. He has also been a legal adviser to the Knesset on constitutional issues and was a visiting scholar at Yale Law School.

Gross began his brief remarks with an act of tenderness not normally seen at gatherings of bench, bar and policy-makers. In his introductory acknowledgments and salutations, he made mention of his "dear wife Dina." It was immediately endearing. And it showed irrefutable evidence of a loving heart to match an obviously incisive and challenging mind.

Gross spoke with deep conviction and passion.

"The moral weapon in Israel's fight against terrorism is the rule of law," he began.

It was a proposition that he would emphasize and re-emphasize throughout the evening.

Gross focused on the sharp contrast between the aims and methods of the IDF – an army that is loyal to the rule of law – and those of the brutish alliance of cruel terrorists – Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – that knows only the rule of the gun.

"The struggle against terrorism," he explained, "is against those people who abhor the rule of law. Israel restricts the army to operating within the rule of law. Commanders in the IDF must operate within the limits of the law. They have no other option."

But when he spoke about the methods of the two opposing forces, he was making a much broader and deeper statement about the values underpinning the respective societies in whose name the forces fight.

"The values that govern us as a democratic state means we respect the basic human rights of the other side, even those of the terrorists themselves. We are constantly striving to find the right balance between securing the needs of the individuals and the needs of the state."

The fiercely independent judicial system, Gross strongly implied, is the hand that intervenes in the uniquely trying circumstances of daily Israeli life to find the appropriate midpoint, the delicate fulcrum, upon which those competing needs will be balanced.

Although he could have illustrated his point with any of numerous cases heard by the Supreme Court of Israel when it sits as the High Court of Justice hearing private petitions, Gross brought to the audience's attention the petitions submitted to the Court during the fighting in Jenin in March/April 2002.

"We open the doors of the courts, through judicial review, for individuals to petition the courts to apply the rule of law," he said. "Even during the fighting in Jenin, human rights organizations petitioned the Supreme Court to intervene in the military operation. I do not know of any other country that would allow advocates on behalf of the 'enemy' to petition the court in this manner to influence the fighting. Our concept of democracy enables everyone to challenge the legality of the government's decisions."

On the subject of Israel's policy of "targeting" and "extra-judicial killing," the professor said those very terminologies betray bias against Israel.

"What Israel is doing," he said, "is trying to defend itself against the enemies that are about to kill us.

"When there is hard evidence, that is, clear and compelling evidence, checked by an objective forum, within the concept of proportionality [of response to the threat] and when there is no chance of detaining the enemy, the decision can be taken to stop the enemy [from attempting to perpetrate his violence upon our citizens].

"There is no rule in international law that requires a state to sacrifice its own soldiers to save the lives of the enemy."

Gross pointed out that the international community has not been able to agree upon a definition of terrorism.

"But, at the very least," he said, "a definition of terrorism should include those cases when one takes the lives of civilians on purpose. And according to any standard, suicide bombers are terrorists."

And the crux of the problem is that those terrorists despise the "rule of law," the submission to rules whose foundation is the belief in the absolutely inviolable, sacred value of each and every human life. When democracies fight terrorists, the "rule" is both the cord that ties one hand behind its back and the lifeblood of decency and goodness that sustains it as it fights for its life.

Israel subjected to a double standard: Dershowitz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The world subjects Israel to a double standard, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz charged last week.

Dershowitz, here to promote his new book, The Case for Israel, compared the current situation to "primitive, old-fashioned racism."

In a speech sponsored by the Speakers' Forum, he lambasted those who expect more of Israel than of the Arabs.

He characterized this expectation as racist.

Dershowitz claimed the double standard discriminates against Israel, destroys the credibility of the United Nations and human rights groups such as Amnesty International, and encourages terrorism.

As an example, he likened Israel to Jordan.

By any objective standard, Israel is a working democracy, while Jordan is not. Yet Jordan, unlike Israel, has never been the target of international opprobrium, he pointed out.

Calling Israel "the most maligned country" on college campuses and in Europe, Dershowitz decried the " great gap between perception and reality" when it comes to Israel.

He said he wrote The Case for Israel because Israel, the only functioning democracy in the Middle East, has-been unfairly attacked.

Israel is regularly taken to task, while police states such as Syria and Libya are handed United Nations committee chairmanships and Security Council memberships, he said bitterly.

In a critique of the United Nations, he said 40 per cent of its resolutions have singled out Israel for condemnation.

All nations, including Israel, should be judged by the same standard, he said.

Alan Dershowitz

He condemned critics who single out Israel for special treatment while ignoring the failings of other countries in the region.

Such critics, he said, court anti-Semitism.

Saying he feels perfectly comfortable criticizing this or that Israeli policy, Dershowitz confided that he would have been a member of Peace Now had he been an Israeli citizen.

Dershowitz said he opposes Israel's occupation of the territories, the construction of settlements there and the building of a security fence that juts deeply into the West Bank.

The fence, he observed, "confuses security with political resolution." He said it should roughly follow the contours of the pre-1967 border.

In contrast, Israel's security fence around the Gaza Strip is perfectly legitimate because it runs along the border.

Dershowitz also criticized Israel's recent announcement of its intention to "remove" Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat from power.

He described that decision of its future aims as the "dumbest thing imaginable."

Dershowitz, however, excoriated Arafat, claiming that Israel and the Palestinians will never achieve peace in Arafat's lifetime.

As he put it, Arafat "cannot and never will make peace."

Dershowitz said the Palestinians were on "the wrong side" of every war in the 20th century, from World War I to the 1991 Gulf War.

Palestinians, therefore, "do not deserve" to sit at the negotiating table with Israel as "equal partners."

Nevertheless, they are entitled to statehood, and a Palestinian state is manifestly in Israel's vested interest, he said.

Describing himself as "pro-Palestinian people but not pro-Palestinian leadership," he said that a Palestinian state should be " a reward" for ending terrorism.

At present, he added, Palestinian schools and mullahs encourage terrorism.

In a suggestion for ending the current political impasse, he said Israel should relinquish the settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in conjunction with simultaneous Palestinian steps to dismantle terrorist groups.

But the settlements should not be given up unilaterally and "for nothing," he noted.

A review of The Case for Israel will appear next week.

Libeskind to speak at Holocaust Education Week

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto's 23rd annual Holocaust Education Week (HEW) is expanding its borders this year, with a few of its more than 120 programs being held in Barrie, Belleville, Kingston, Newmarket, Oshawa, Peterborough and St. Catharines.

The 13-day event, co-ordinated by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, kicks off Oct. 30 at Temple Sinai, with Michael Berenbaum, formerly of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum discussing "The Rescue of Danish Jewry: Why was Denmark Different?"

The closing program, on Nov. 11, will feature human rights champion Irwin Cotler, and Maj.-Gen. Edward Fitch, the highest-ranking Jewish officer in the Canadian Forces, who will address "The Holocaust and Human Rights: What Have We Learned? What Must We Do?" at Adath Israel Congregation.

"Every year the committee decides we have too many programs, and that we are going to scale back," said Joan Shapero, HEW co-chair with Honey Carr. "Then more venues would like to be included, and we don't want to turn anyone away. It's massive.

"If you can make people aware of what the dangers are of targeting and isolating any particular group – of the damage that hatred, discrimination and prejudice can do – you're hoping to create a better world," said Shapero. "You can't give up. I think you have to keep trying."

A total of almost 15,000 people attended Holocaust Education Week last year, she said.

In addition to a wide variety of presentations, this year's Holocaust Education Week showcases four exhibits, including "Women in the Holocaust: Faces of Resistance" at Koffler Centre of the Arts; and "Denmark 1943" at Temple Sinai. There are also an increased number of church programs, said Shapero. "The committee has always felt very strongly that this not just be for the Jewish community."

Daniel Libeskind

A longtime volunteer who is completing a course at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) on Holocaust and Genocide Studies, Shapero said that even educators with day school backgrounds may be uncomfortable dealing with the Holocaust in the classroom.

Notable HEW sessions this year include:

- a day-long seminar for educators on Oct. 31 at the Holocaust Centre of Toronto on "Holocaust Orphans in Canada." Presenters include Frieda Miller, education co-ordinator at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre; Harold Lass, retired head of English at Northern Secondary School, on "Holocaust and Literature"; and Belarie Zatzman of York University, on "Fine Arts and Holocaust Education", Participating teachers can receive professional development credit.
- the world premiere of Oratorio Terezin, Nov. 1, 8 p.m. and Nov. 2, 3 p.m., at Toronto Centre for the Arts.
- Nicky's Children, a documentary about the 669 children saved by Nicholas Winton, a young British stockbroker. Among the children was CBC correspondent Joe Schlesinger, who will speak after the screening. Nov. 1, 8:30 p.m., Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.
- "Jewish Resistance During the Shoah", with Steven Katz, director of the Elie Wiesel Center for Judaic Studies at Boston University, Nov. 2, 8 p.m., Shaar Shalom Synagogue.
- "Interviewing Family Members about the Holocaust," with Gail Mentlik, documentary maker, Nov. 4, 7:30 p.m., Beth Torah Congregation.
- "Anti-Semitism/Anti-Zionism: Converging Hatreds," with Shulamit Imber of Yad Vashem, Jerusalem and Bernie Farber, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, Nov. 5, 8 p.m., Beth Tzedec Congregation.
- "Survivor Families: From Strength to Strength," a one-day conference for adult children of Holocaust survivors, and their partners. Pre-registration is required by Oct. 20 (call 416-785-2500, ext. 2853 or go to www.baycrest.org, and click on "events"), Nov. 9, 8:30 to 5 p.m.,Baycrest Centre.

Renowned architect Daniel Libeskind will be the keynote speaker at the Community Commemoration of Kristallnacht at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Nov. 8 at 8 p.m. He will discuss "Designing Sacred Space: Memorializing the Holocaust."

Admission is not charged at the majority of the programs, although a donation of $3 per person per event is suggested. "We operate on a very tiny budget for the type of the program we do," said Shapero.

Reaching for the stars, he soared

Light refracted through the complex intersecting edges and angles of precious stone shows us things we would not, could not, ordinarily see. So it is with man. So it was with Izzy Asper. Such was the sheer force of his multi-dimensional personality that it pulled, magnified and shone a very bright light onto countless causes, ideas, ideals and benefactions around the world.

More than 1,500 people attended his funeral last week in Winnipeg. They filled the synagogue and lined the adjacent streets, combining – in one final farewell – a bowing of respect with a gesture of gratitude.

Izzy Asper was a unique man. He understood, perhaps more than most, that the impermanence of life makes it ever more poignant. That all our labours mean nothing if they do not acknowledge that life's poignancy lends urgency to all we do. That we are obliged to do the very best we can, or as he would say, to "reach for the stars," in all circumstances.

Reaching constantly for the stars, he soared.

He refused to fly low.

He also refused to accept the notion that there was anything small or inferior or secondary in being Canadian, Manitoban and Jewish. His causes were his passions. And his passions inspired him to great achievements in business, in philanthropy, in private, public and communal leadership.

Israel H. Asper

"Stand tall," he told an Israel Bonds audience in Montreal last year, "in support of honesty in reporting, as well as for the right of Israel to exist and to take whatever actions it needs to battle its savage attackers and to demand that our media and our politicians act with honour in this quest."

During the last three years, in the wake of the surrealistic but deadly campaign against Israel and the vicious assaults around the world against Israelis, Jews and Judaism, no one spoke out with more courage or moral clarity on behalf of the Jewish state and against its many disparagers and ill-wishers than Izzy Asper.

He knew that in confronting Israel's enemies, we are also confronting the enemies of Western democracies. "I am an unashamed and unrelenting Canadian patriot. I am not going to stand idly back to watch any of the democratic ideals that made Canada the envy of nations be injured, sullied or disgraced."

"Don't think that you are powerless," he exhorted the audience in Montreal last October. Through his example, his determination, will, generosity and grit, Izzy Asper showed us that we are not powerless, but only if we choose not to be.

May his memory be for blessing and may his family be comforted with all other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Takeover of CJC not right

I am sad and angry about the news that the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) may soon find itself taken over by a new, unelected group that will apparently decide who speaks for Canadian Jewry. This is not the Jewish way and it is not an effective way.

When I came to Canada with my late parents and brother after fleeing post-war Poland, CJC was already an established voice for Canadian Jewry. It stood up for the community in court, in front of governments and on behalf of any Jew, rich or poor, religious or secular, whose rights were being denied. I see CJC continuing that job today and continuing to do it well. As a member of the Montreal Jewish community and as a proud Zionist, I believe we can only fight for what is right by behaving properly and democratically. Taking over CJC and putting the power to speak for Jews in the hands of a small group of influential but unelected individuals is simply wrong. I hope that Jewish wisdom and justice will prevail, and CJC will remain strong and effective for many years to come.

Negotiations or appeasement?

Because I have a healthy respect for Prof. Harvey Simmons' acumen, I'm sorry to see that he has misconstrued the essential thrust of my article's argument ("Israel's appeasement habits," CJN, Aug. 7). In his letter ("Zerker in denial," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Oct. 2), Simmons claimed that I characterized negotiations as appeasement. Not true. What I maintain is that Israeli negotiations have too often resulted in appeasement on the part of Israeli leaders.

It was appeasement when former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin told Israelis they must tolerate murders committed by Palestinian terrorism so that the "peace process" would not be halted, and that nevertheless, his government would persist in carrying forward the Oslo agreement. (Some "peace process," some agreement!) It was appeasement when former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu handed over Hebron to the Palestinians despite the fact that they had not fulfilled their obligations under the terms of Oslo Two. And it was appeasement when current Prime Minister Ariel Sharon released hundreds of Palestinian prisoners as a "confidence gesture," despite the fact that it was not a requirement of the mutually signed road map peace plan, and despite the irrefutable evidence that the Palestinians were intent on waging their vicious terrorist war. And what was it, if not appeasement, when the Peres/Beilin/Rabin triumvirate rescued from obscurity in Tunis that arch- terrorist Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – the inventor of modern terrorist methods – and transported him along with thousands of his thugs to Israeli soil. This dangerous manoeuvre was based on the delusion (they used the word "hope") that Arafat would give up Palestinian ambitions for Israel's destruction.

Appeasement is about trying to placate an enemy by making concessions that are beyond negotiations in the hopes that such measures might soothe the enemy's appetite for aggression and murder. But appeasement never works. It only feeds the enemy's lust. Instead of hope, one is left with despair.

Elitist view of the law

I agree with President Aharon Barak of Israel's Supreme Court on the importance of maintaining Israel's "democratic core" ("Judges meet supreme test in war on terror," CJN, Sept. 18). But I must strongly disagree that the maintenance of the rule of law and human rights in some abstract, theoretical sense is required "even if that may prolong the war on terror" and that it "makes the struggle worthwhile."

Let's read between the lines. Is Barak suggesting that even more Israelis should die in suicide terror attacks to ensure the human rights of the terrorists and the Palestinian population that support them? Of course, he would deny this, but is this not the inevitable consequence of his type of elitist, ivory tower thinking?

Make no mistake. Israel is at war and has no choice but to win. The chauffeur-driven crowd in Israel today is as oblivious to this reality as other elites have been in Jewish history when tragedy was just around the corner. The majority of Israelis who must make their way in a dangerous world know quite well that our heritage is built on "human dignity," but also believe that they deserve their fair share. In my view, the average Israeli knows, as Barak evidently does not, that the protection of our own lives must come before the "civil rights" of our enemies.

Hundreds of Israelis have died in terror attacks in the past three years. Barak's insensitivity betrays their ultimate sacrifice for the State of Israel and the Jewish people. Our "foundations" are weak indeed if we do understand that our national existence depends on living rather than dead Jews.

Izzy Asper (1932-2003)

I didn't actually know Izzy (Israel) Asper, but I feel as if I did.

As a Canadian and a Jew, I recognized in the reports describing his life, the core human value that makes both our country and our people essential: to strive for all that life has to offer but then, having been blessed to live in a country where this is still possible, to give back in spades, and therefore to recognize how fortunate we are and what an enormous responsibility freedom really is.

I would like to add my name to the many thousands of Canadians who have had the honour and pleasure of meeting Izzy Asper. I have followed his growth in industry and have felt extremely proud of this individual who was never afraid to stand up for what he believed in and "to tell it like it is." It was on a return trip from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev that I had the pleasure to speak to Izzy and discuss some issues. He even gave me advice for one of my children who wanted to pursue a career in radio and televison.

The Jewish community, and indeed all Canadaians, have lost a valuable treasure in his passing. I believe that he has passed on his tremendous knowledge and beliefs to his children, who seem to echo how he felt about Canada, Israel and the rest of the world. I pray they have the health and strength to continue his legacy. To his family, I share in his mourning and pray that God grant them peace and health in their loss.

Dishonest reporting: Media bias against Israel

By ISRAEL H. ASPER

The following is excerpted from a speech delivered by Israel Asper at the Israel Bonds Gala in Montreal, Oct. 30, 2002.

Throughout my lifetime, I have had an unshakable commitment to three cornerstones of my personal value system: my first commitment is to this great nation, Canada. My second is to Israel as a symbol and teacher of excellence for all of humankind, and the third is to the media as the most honourable and steadfast advocate, defender and distributor of truth, honesty, fairness, freedom, democracy and human rights.

With a combination of sadness, fear and anger, I must now tell you that both Israel and the honour of the news media are under grievous assault. And, even more painful for me, even though at first glance those two pillars should be separate, I regret to say, they are both threatened by the same cancer and have thus become inextricably linked. This is because dishonest reporting is destroying the trust in and credibility of the media and the journalists, and the same dishonest reporting is biased against Israel, thus destroying the world's favourable disposition toward it…

Tonight I make the charge that much of the world media who are covering the Arab-Israeli conflict have abandoned the fundamental precepts of honest reporting. They have been taken captive by their own biases or victimized by their own ignorance. They have adopted Palestinian propaganda as the context for their stories. They have become partisans in and not providers of knowledge about this war against Israel…

Dishonest reporting occurs in several forms. One is through the selection of terminology such as words or phrases which promote a presumed set of facts. "Terror" has been well-defined by major recognized laws. But many biased media describe the Palestinian perpetrators of clear acts of terror against Israel merely as "militants," "resistance fighters," "gunmen" or "extremists."

Dishonest reporting arises not only by what is said, but also by what is not said but which is necessary for the reader or the listener or viewer to know in order to have a full understanding of the situation, in the context of historical fact.

… [W]e should touch on some fundamental lies on which many reporters and analysts base their view of the war.

The first and worst lie is what this war is all about. Dishonest reporting tells you that it's about territory, and Jerusalem, and Palestinian statehood, and alleged refugees. Honest reporting would tell you that it is a war to destroy Israel and kill or expel or subjugate all the Jews. That is proved by the words and deeds of all the key Arab Palestinian leaders. But the media has bought and reported dishonestly and relentlessly the big lie. That big lie is that this war could be ended by Israeli land concessions.

The second fundamental big lie disseminated by world media, including those in Canada, is what gave rise to the current version of the Arab war of extermination of Israel and the Jewish people – the so-called Al-Aqsa uprising or intifadah.

The truth is that when Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, one of the world's most cruel and vicious terrorists for the past 30 years, that corrupt dictator and thief of billions of dollars of world-intended aid for his people, could not get the extravagant concessions he demanded from the Clinton Camp David meetings, he planned the uprising of terrorism as a means of intimidating the United States and Israel into giving in to his maniacal demands.

But he needed an excuse, an appealing argument in which to clothe his new latest war.

And so, in early September 2000, when parliamentary opposition leader Ariel Sharon (he wasn't even prime minister) told both Israelis and Palestinian officials he intended to visit the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, legally part of Israel which is co-sited with the Muslim al-Aqsa mosque, they agreed, and both Palestinian and Israeli security detachments accompanied him on his brief tour.

This was the opportunity Arafat sought. He immediately unleashed the rioting, stone-throwing and armed attacks allegedly as a "spontaneous" uprising against Israel allegedly in response to Sharon's provocation.

It was then that most of the world media bought the propaganda that launched the second big lie of the current warfare: "Sharon's visit provokes Palestinian rebellion." They didn't even ask the fundamental question: Is this true?

The third big lie is that the current conflict arises from Palestinian frustration over the slowness of the so-called "peace process."

The central, and conveniently ignored, fact is that the current warfare is merely the latest chapter in a war against the Jewish people. That war began in earnest 85 years ago, when in 1917, Britain and the League of Nations declared, with world approval, that a Jewish state would be established in Palestine.

The region's Arabs have engaged in terrorist slaughter, riots and multi Muslim states military invasion against the Jewish nation ever since. The only periodic lulls in this savage and often barbaric assault, specializing in seeking women, children and elderly victims, have occurred when the Arabs have been resoundingly defeated.

Then, they sue for peace, issue poor-me hand-wringing pleas for international help, and use the lull in the battle to regroup, re-arm and plot their next assault – and it is routinely launched.

Any reportage or commentary that is not clothed in this context is, at best, misleading or ignorant and plain dishonest at worst.

A great deal of the dishonesty arises from the failure to report and the failure to opine on many factors which must be considered in judging the Middle East war…

But if nothing else in this entire sad and sordid story irrefutably demonstrates the dishonest reporting and inherent media bias against Israel, it is the Jenin massacre myth on which the herd of ravenous reporters descended with vulture-like hysteria.

Hysterical, hyperbolical Palestinian propagandists shrieked "massacre – 5,000 innocents slaughtered," and the United Nations, the Third World pawns, dutifully closed ranks to condemn Israel, as is routine for that corrupt organization. Soon the Palestinians reduced their alleged death toll to 3,000. Then the number of alleged deaths claimed mysteriously dropped to a mere 500, but the media still sang the massacre melody.

Finally, when the UN Commission declared that only 54 Palestinians had died, and over half of them were armed combatants, the myth exploded. However, few media apologized or retracted the charges of "genocide," "war crimes" and "heinous Israeli atrocities" they had falsely trumpeted to the world.

… When the myth of massacre was exploded, there were no apologies, few retractions and naturally some of the mud that the dishonest reporters had flung stuck to the shield of honour of Israel.

Contrast that with a true war crime that occured shortly after.

It is an offence under the Geneva War Conventions for armed persons to occupy any church. Yet the whole world sat silently and did not condemn the crime that occurred when Palestinian terrorists in Bethlehem, by a well-designed plan, occupied the Christian Church of the Nativity, took its occupants hostage and refused to surrender to surrounding Israeli soldiers. No one demanded it.

Rather, the so-called world community, aided by a silent media, brought huge international pressure against Israel to give up its barricade and let the alleged terrorists go.

When Israel bowed to the pressure, there was no United Nations intervention, no Christian Church intervention and no condemnation of the war crimes committed by the terrorists…

I've made no reference to world media hypocrisy in condemning the Bali nightclub bombers as terrorists but not the Palestinian bombers of Passover services in Netanya.

I've made no mention of the failure of our media to report on and explode the dozens of Palestinian propaganda myths, all of which have been shattered by the facts.

Why is this happening? The answer is plain to see.

Firstly, too many of the journalists are lazy, or sloppy… They are ignorant of the history of the subject on which they are writing.

Others are, plain and simple, biased or anti-Semitic, or are taken captive by a simplistic ideology.

The result is that the biggest casualties of the Palestinian-Israeli war are truth and the integrity of the media.

Every one of us must do what we can to correct this travesty. It is time to say, "Enough!"

The solution starts on the campus, and in the journalism schools, then it goes to the boardrooms of the media owners, and finally, and most importantly, with you the public…

The issue here is not the media bias against Israel, the issue is the media bias, period. If we cannot trust the media in its reporting on Israel, how can we trust it on anything else? And if we cannot trust our media, democracy is profoundly threatened…

[O]ne of the lethal by-products of this prostitution of media integrity is that it has helped fan the flames of anti-Semitism throughout the world…

We are witnessing the most virulent, vitriolic and vicious anti-Semitism, rivaled only by the rise of Nazism and its anti-Semitism in Europe in the middle 1930s. Left unchecked, it will consume all freedoms, because every attack of anti-Semitism in the history of mankind, has always been a forerunner to the destruction of liberty in all other sectors of human endeavour, not just for Jews, but for everyone. The painful lesson of the last century is that freedom is indivisible…

At this time, the appropriate position for all Canadians should be to stand tall in support of honesty in reporting, as well as for the right of Israel to exist and to take whatever actions it needs to battle its savage attackers, and to demand that our media and our politicians act with honour in this quest.

The oldest prejudice

Hold everything, dear reader! You are likely to assume that the word "prejudice" in the headline for this column refers to Jews, and that you are about to read yet another necessary defence of the Jewish people.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Not this time.

For once, you will not read about Jews being the object of popular misjudgment, but rather about another group of people.

The ones I have in mind are "old folk."

The word "old" has, of course, an imprecise meaning. For some children, 15 years of age may warrant the term "old," while for others, the word "old" may mean 60, and for still others, 90 years of age comes to mind, and so on.

But "old" – whether referring to people or things – formerly meant "valuable," and many of the heroes of biblical antiquity were said to have reached very advanced ages.

Thus, according to ancient tradition, Methusaleh died at 969 years of age, and the forbears of Israel, too, are reported by the Bible to have become very old when compared to our own experience: Abraham lived to the ripe old age of 175 years; Isaac, 180, Jacob, 147; and Moses to 120 – an age that henceforth Jewish tradition has considered to be the ultimate blessing.

However, the book of Psalms lowers our expectations significantly and says: "The days of our years are 70 years, and by reason of [special] strength, 80 years."

The Encyclopedia Judaica summarizes the Jewish attitude toward getting old in the following fashion:

"According to the Talmud, youth is a crown of roses; old age a crown of [heavy] willow rods (Shabbat 152a). A man must pray that in his later years his eyes may see, his mouth eat, his legs walk, for in old age all powers fail (Midrash Tanchuma, Mi-Ketz 10)."

Nevertheless, former generations may be said to have generally respected the aged for the wisdom that they – hopefully – had acquired during their many years of living.

Once we again treat the aged with the respect that they enjoyed in bygone days, the term "old" will also return to its former positive meaning of "valuable." But not until then.

I want to conclude these considerations with a personal note.

The above was written from an admittedly prejudiced perspective, for in another few weeks, I hope to be celebrating my 91st birthday. But that does not necessarily vitiate what I have tried to convey to you here.

News of death

I have finally come to understand why I have always hated hospitals so much.

It's not the sea of white everywhere I look, or the cloying smell of antiseptic and surgical steel that seems to follow me wherever I go.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

It's the way the hallways are filled with the haunting stench of my own mortality.

And it seems I am reminded of it every time I turn on the news.

I've been thinking about life's tendency to be so dreadfully temporary, but perhaps more so of the injustice of the deck of cards that life deals to us at times.

It's so easy to wallow in a pool of negativity when you open the newspaper or turn on the TV set and find yourself immediately confronted with acts of hostility and violence going on anywhere in the world you can think of.

It's easier still to dismiss these conflicts as never-ending plagues.

On the same day I watched a nation reel in shock and grief from Israel's latest suicide bombing, I got a phone call telling me my friend's mother had passed away suddenly due to cancer.

It's amazing how death can simultaneously bridge and divide groups of people.

I have no idea what it would be like to live in a country where tragedy is an everyday occurrence. I think of the way the greater tragedy lies in how these fatalities fade into obscurity as the media give preferential coverage to questionable subjects such as Alberta's premier getting hit in the face by a banana cream pie.

I think of my friend, who had been nursing her mother to health for some time.

Her mother was a breast cancer survivor whose hair was just starting to grow back in wisps. I remember her vivaciousness as she danced with us in the living room at her daughter's birthday party only six weeks ago.

She peeled cucumbers and washed dark green lettuce under the sink for the salads for dinner, adjusting her wig from time to time so it would sit straight on her head, and laughing and dancing with us in between bringing bowls of food out to the table.

Her turn for the worse was quite sudden. A week after the party, she found that the cancer had returned, only now it had spread to her lungs and her bones, and this time it was terminal.

Six weeks after she threw her head back and laughed in the kitchen, swaying to the beat of the music, she drew her last breath.

Still, even in the darkest of times, I suppose one can light a candle of hope.

Some people read the Torah or the Bible when looking for comfort.

Me, I pick up The Diary of Anne Frank.

I don't know what it is about Anne Frank that has captured my attention so consistently since I first picked up her diary at the age of nine. She is the ultimate testament to how hope can still bloom under the most dire of circumstances.

"That's the difficulty in these times. Ideals, dreams and cherished hopes rise within us, only to meet the horrible truth and be shattered."

Her words, initially penned more than half a century ago, still hold true for us today.

Anne Frank's open, earnest gaze has made her the poster child for someone who believed in the good in others even as she died at the hands of those who couldn't care less.

"It's really a wonder that I haven't dropped all my ideals, because they seem so absurd and impossible to carry out," she wrote. "Yet I keep them, because in spite of everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart. I simply can't build my hopes on a foundation consisting of confusion, misery and death."

Me too.

In spite of the injustices and unpredictability of this world, I think I know how some people continually find the energy to retaliate not with hatred and despair, but with kindness.

I guess it's really because it's just so damn difficult to do – or be – anything less.

Hurricane provides a time to reflect

There is a tree sitting on my house. The blame goes to Hurricane Juan, but after four days without power, I am inclined to thank Juan for one of the best weeks I have experienced in a long time.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

When Hurricane Juan struck, I was alone in my Halifax house, as my roommates had gone home for Rosh Hashanah. The wind was so loud I couldn't hear myself think, but the shaking house and leaking roof did not convey the full force of the impact the hurricane was having. Stepping outside my house on Monday morning, I became aware of the consequences of the storm.

Massive trees had toppled and power lines were down, as Juan took his toll on the city. Cars were crushed and homes were destroyed, but as we remained without news and any understanding of what had transpired, there was a surreal aspect to it. With the lights out and technology out of reach, a powerful quiet took hold of the city and provided a much-needed halt in our hectic schedules.

For the overactive imagination, it seemed more than just a bit ironic that this all-powerful force of nature came to disrupt our lives during the 10 days of tshuvah, the period of reflection between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. The literary notion of pathetic fallacy resounded strongly. Surrounded by the almost incomprehensible effects of a natural disaster at a time when we are being judged for our actions and behaviour – it seemed to fit a little too well.

We are used to being in control of most aspects of our lives. We utilize the tools of technology to cram as much as possible into the 24 hours of every day. We have become so dependent on the accoutrements of modern life that we take basic comforts for granted.

But when the lights went out and the city shut down, we took the time to really sit and relax, to think about what is going on in our lives. Shabbat brings a similar break every week, but we are individuals taking a break from an environment that continues to speed by. Hurricane Juan slowed life down for everyone. It forced us to acknowledge that we cannot control nature and that ultimately, the environment cannot be contained by human means.

While we all need a jolt to look at our mode of life, I wonder whether there really is an aspect of pathetic fallacy in Juan's recent attack on Halifax. Is it possible that we were being forced to look up and acknowledge our attitudes and behaviours? Is a natural disaster the wake-up call we need to recognize how dependent we have become on the "necessities" of modern life?

As the sun came up and marked the end of the storm, it was amazing to see people walking down the debris-laden streets with eyes open to their surroundings. Halifax is small enough that virtually every street is familiar, but for the first time, people began to actually see their physical surroundings.

Before our freezers full of kosher meat from Toronto and Montreal could go bad, we feasted together, making the best of the situation. Sitting under the stars, we conversed and caught up, appreciating the calm that arose from acceptance of the fact that we were powerless.

The 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur fly by. Caught up in plans for yom tov and the everyday obligations of school and work, it is easy to lose sight of what the time is for. Perhaps the tree had to fall on my house in order to shake me out of the activity that holds such a strong grasp on each day.

Hurricane Juan was unlike anything I have ever experienced: lives were lost and severe hardship will continue to haunt many, even as the visible damage of the storm is repaired. But for all the havoc that Juan has wreaked, something positive remains.

We need to acknowledge our limits, to take a role in effecting the changes we are capable of, while acknowledging that much remains beyond our control. Sitting in the quiet darkness of night in a city without power, it becomes easier to see – while the ominous tree hanging over your home makes you think about where your own roots are grounded.

The Kirshner File

Rosenstrasse - a labour of love for German director

In the winter of 1943, when German film director Margarethe von Trotta was but an infant in diapers, an unprecedented event in the annals of Nazi Germany unfolded grimly in Berlin. There, on Rosenstrasse, a small, drab street in the eastern part of the city, a remarkable protest, born of love, solidarity and courage, grew in the face of drawn weapons.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A month after Germany lost the fateful battle of Stalingrad, the regime began arresting Berlin's 10,000 remaining Jews and deporting them to concentration camps in Poland. Men in intermarriages, and some women, were taken to a building on Rosenstrasse that belonged to the Jewish community.

On Feb. 28, four days after Adolf Hitler declared that the war would lead to the "annihilation" of Jews, their Christian wives converged on Rosenstrasse, demanding their release. Time and time again, the SS and police dispersed the demonstrators. Unintimidated by the show of force, the women repeatedly returned to Rosenstrasse.

Informed of these irksome developments, Josef Goebbels, the influential propaganda minister, noted in his diary on March 2: "We are definitely removing the Jews from Berlin: last Sunday they were arrested suddenly, and will be deported to the east within the shortest possible time."

On March 5, the SS aimed machine guns at the crowd, and were met with defiant shouts of "murderers." The guns were removed.

Finally, the interned Rosenstrasse Jews were freed. Goebbels, in a notation in his diary, wrote that he had ordered the police to stop the evacuation.

Still more amazingly, 25 Rosenstrasse prisoners who had been transported to Auschwitz were sent back to Berlin and, from there, dispatched to a work camp.

In a dictatorship where civil disobedience was equated with treason and mercilessly snuffed out, Rosenstrasse was a unique incident, a shining beam of light in a dark landscape.

Almost 10 years ago, when von Trotta was editing a film, fellow director Volker Schlondorff introduced her to Daniela Schmidt, who had made a documentary titled Resistance in Rosenstrasse, Berlin 1943. Though von Trotta was quite familiar with the history of the Third Reich and the fate of Germany's Jews, she had never run across a reference to Rosenstrasse in her readings. A charter member of Germany's "1968" generation who had been touched by the Holocaust and who had rebelled against her parents' and grandparents' values, she was so moved by the incredible bravery and undaunted spirit of these women that she seriously considered making a feature film about that virtually forgotten but inspirational event.

Rosenstrasse, her 14th movie since her debut as a director in 1977, was screened last month at the Toronto International Film Festival, shortly after its world premiere at the Venice Film Festival. Scheduled to open in theatres in 2004, Rosenstrasse will be distributed by Samuel Goldwyn Jr.

"It's an important story that has to be told," said von Trotta, a resident of Munich, a former actress closely identified with the New German Cinema movement and one of Germany's most distinguished directors.

A scene from the movie

"These women were not political. They only wanted their husbands back."

A woman of medium height, with short, layered gray hair, she made these comments in an interview during the festival.

As she acknowledged, Rosenstrasse, starring the luminous Katja Riemann and the intense Maria Schrader, was a labour of love that gradually fell into place.

After meeting Schmidt, von Trotta spoke to 10 of the Rosenstrasse survivors. "It was only after these impressive personal encounters that I really became motivated."

To prepare for the movie, she visited Rosenstrasse and immersed herself in the literature of the Holocaust and Jews. Primo Levi's What is a Man, in particular, affected her.

Rosenstraße

Once she got down to the task of writing a script, she knew she had to visit Auschwitz, which she had studiously avoided.

In 1995, in the company of two documentary filmmakers, she spent half a day there. Auschwitz left an indelible impression on von Trotta, whose father, she said with palpable relief, had neither joined the Nazi party nor, because of a disability, been recruited into the Wehrmacht.

Because of budgetary problems, von Trotta scrapped the first draft of her script. But after watching another documentary on the subject, Liberation from Rosenstrasse, she composed a second draft, one of whose subplots is about a little girl named Ruth whose mother was imprisoned at Rosenstrasse.

Margarethe von Trotta

To von Trotta's disappointment, the project floundered. "Nobody wanted to know about the courage of these women," she mused. And so she turned her energies to other film and television projects.

Von Trotta's colleague, Martin Wiebel, "brought the material back from the dead" in 1999, when he encouraged her to revisit the dormant project. She revised the script yet again.

Financing was a stumbling block, but in the spring of 2002, she raised the equivalent of $6.5 million in euros.

It was a modest sum. By contrast, The Pianist cost $35 million.

Filming started last October in Germany's fabled Babelsberger Studio, and wrapped in mid-December.

Poignant and affecting, Rosenstrasse cuts between the present and the past, moving from a tastefully furnished apartment in Manhattan to a mean street in Berlin, and back again.

The plot of Rosenstrasse is built around Lena Fischer (Riemann), a fictional character who, von Trotta said, is really an amalgam of several women.

Strong and beautiful, Lena is the scion of an aristocratic family. Her Jewish husband, Fabian, a violinist, has disappeared. She thinks he is in Rosenstrasse.

In a desperate bid to save Fabian, Lena asks her father for help. He is a forbidding ex-general, as well as an unreconstructed anti-Semite. Curtly and cruelly, he dismisses her plea for assistance.

With no else to turn to, Lena enlists her brother, a wounded war veteran with a heart of gold, in an elaborate scheme to spring Fabian from Rosenstrasse.

For von Trotta, the Holocaust remains an enigma encased in a riddle.

"Mankind," she mused, " can go crazy."

Asked how how a nation as refined and civilized as Germany could have conceived the Holocaust, she shrugged her shoulders and shook her head in sadness.

But then she added, "Not all Germans were monsters."

The Nazis, she observed, were "diabolically intelligent." They phased in their anti-Semitic agenda so gradually and seamlessly that it was like a process of osmosis.

Yet von Trotta expressed surprise at the open-minded attitude of some Jews to Germany.

"I would mistrust a nation like this forever," she said sombrely.

Jewish Life

Anzia Yezierska's hungry heart

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Who today has heard of the American writer Anzia Yezierska?

Her life was the sort of rags-to-riches-and-back-to-rags tale that she specialized in telling in her short stories and novels like Salome of the Tenements and The Bread-Givers.

She and her large impoverished family sailed from Poland in the 1890s and settled into a cramped tenement on the Lower East Side. Her father, rejecting the crass materialism of America, sequestered himself with the Talmud. Her mother, embittered from the grind of daily existence, rejected America's fetish for individualism as expressed through customs like children's birthday parties.

"Birthdays?" the mother once retorted when the girl demanded to know her date of birth. "A birthday wills itself in you? What is with you the great joy? No shirt on your back, no shoes on your feet, not a penny in the house to buy bread, and you want yet birthdays?"

For Yezierska, like countless others of the immigrant generation, coming of age meant slaving in sweatshops and laundries. Yet, also like countless others, her spirit was infused by the promise of the American dream. Pushing herself to master English, she won a scholarship to Columbia University and devoted every minute of her spare time to writing tales of Jewish immigrant life.

The effort paid off as major magazines began accepting her work. Her short story, The Fat of the Land, was regarded as one of the best stories of 1919 and led Houghton Mifflin to publish a celebrated collection, Hungry Hearts, in 1920.

In a memoir published three decades later, Yezierska recalled how dramatically her life changed after that. One day in her tiny rooming house on Hester Street, a telegram arrived from Samuel Goldwyn, who offered $10,000 for the motion picture rights to Hungry Hearts. Within days Yezierska had an advance of $1,000 plus a first-class train ticket to Hollywood.

Before leaving, she paid a rare visit to her father and dropped $100 on the open pages of his book. He was revulsed by the open display of mammon. "In America, money takes the place of God," he berated her. "Can you touch pitch without being defiled? Neither can you hold on to all that money without losing your soul… Daughter of Babylon! You've polluted your inheritance and none shall be there to save you."

Yezierska scripted several silent films in Hollywood, but never felt comfortable with its wealth, glamour and pretension. She described Hollywood society as "the fish market in evening clothes." Despite lucrative contract offers, she feared the studio was drying her up and eventually fled in a panic. The relative obscurity that awaited her was broken only briefly by the appearance of her 1950 memoir Red Ribbon On A White Horse. (The title supposedly comes from a ghetto proverb: "Poverty becomes a wise man like a red ribbon on a white horse.")

With equal parts prescience and irony, Yezierska had plotted her own career course in early stories such as The Fat of the Land. The story focuses on a mother who struggles, first to feed her young children in the tenement, then, years later, with the humiliating realization that her grown kids are ashamed of her. Fully Americanized and highly successful, they buy her a fancy apartment on Riverside Drive, but, terrified of embarrassing herself before the servants, she flees to a friend's tenement apartment below Delancey Street.

Yezierska had several marriages and a brief affair with philosopher John Dewey, who remained the idealized love of her life. She spent her last years with a daughter in California and died at nearly 90. As a final bit of Yezierskian irony, the movies made from her writings also fell into obscurity. All the prints and negatives have reportedly disintegrated into dust.

Cross-cultural influences on Sukkot

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

It must be a unique marvel of history: Sephardim and Ashkenazim, two communities existing in different lands and circumstances for so long and yet retaining the same fundamentals despite different interpretations, intellectual styles and sociological forces. Today, the two "Jewries" are still essentially one.

One of the reasons Sephardim and Ashkenazim still retain similarities is that they were never totally isolated one from the other. Individuals from each community sometimes went out and ventured into the other. One result of this exchange is cross-cultural influences that can be seen today – for example, on chol hamoed Sukkot.

Perhaps the greatest such cultural crossover occured in the year 1304, which was a turning point in the history of the relations between the two communities.

It was in this year that Rabbeinu Asher Ben Yehiel, commonly referred to as The Rosh, came to Spain from Germany with his family. The Rosh represented the best of the German school. He brought with him a whole different perspective – in particular, the method of the Tosafists, commentators after Rashi who resolved seeming talmudic discrepancies.

The Rosh soon assumed the position of rabbi of The Great Synagogue, the largest congregation of Toledo. As an Ashkenazi chief rabbi for Sephardim, The Rosh managed to bridge two cultures, two approaches and countless variances in customs and prayers.

The Rosh fully integrated himself into the Sephardi pulse. His children were all raised as Sephardim and eventually married Sephardim. This is not to say, however, that The Rosh himself fully adopted Sephardi custom. Although he succeeded in navigating between various customs, he personally acted in accordance with Ashkenazi customs. Yet he was highly regarded by the Sephardi community and many testimonials from that day express reverence for their leader.

One of the diverging customs between Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jewry concerns the wearing of tfillin during chol hamoed, the intermediate days of Sukkot and Pesach. It is the Ashkenazi custom to don tfillin on these days as on any other day. The Sephardim, on the other hand, regard the days of chol hamoed as minor holidays, but holidays nevertheless, and therefore do not wear tfillin. As a result of The Rosh's presence and the community's veneration for him, this tradition was almost changed. Many Jews in Spain began donning tfillin on chol hamoed as did their rabbi.

It was not until many years had passed that these Sephardim again refrained from wearing tfillin on chol hamoed. Some hundred years after The Rosh, Rabbi Yosef Caro, author of the Shulchan Aruch, wrote: "The prevalent custom amongst all Sephardim is not to wear tfillin on chol hamoed. I heard that originally they used to wear them on these days in accordance of the ruling of The Rosh. When, however, they found that the not wearing of tfillin on chol hamoed was attributed to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, they ceased wearing tfillin on chol hamoed."

Incidentally, this cross-pollination travels both ways, as is evidenced by all Chassidim and a sizeable number of other Ashkenazi groups who have adopted the Sephardi custom of not wearing tfillin on chol hamoed.

No quick answers to evil

Books
Bernard Baskin

Evil* by Lance Morrow, Basic Books, $37.

Unhappily, there is nothing new about evil. There have been few eras in human history without wars, massacres and every kind of torture and cruelty. Twentieth-century large-scale killing is only too familiar: the mutual slaughter of World War I, the terror-famine of Ukraine, the gulag, Auschwitz, Dresden, Hiroshima, Vietnam, the Chinese Cultural Revolution, Cambodia, Rwanda, the collapse of Yugoslavia.

At the start of the century, there was optimism that the spread of a humane and scientific outlook would lead to the fading away, not only of war, but also of other forms of inhumane barbarism. In the light of these expectations, the horrors of Adolf Hitler, Josef Stalin, Pol Pot and Saddam Hussein were as unexpected as they were tragic.

The global development of our technology and weapons exceeds the speed of our moral development. The result is planetary regression. We default to our basest instincts, and our ingenious toys speed the descent. Our very technological brilliance presents us with moral dilemmas that we lack the sophistication and the generosity, the wisdom to work our way through.

The persistence of evil has always troubled those who seek to probe the human heart and mind. The biblical book of Job asks, "How can a powerful and just God permit evil?" But the riddle remains unanswered. Shakespeare produced immortal passages filled with both evil and despair: Life is "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing;" and "As flies to wanton boys, are we to the gods: they kill us for their sport." The writings of Herman Melville and Nathaniel Hawthorne, classical American writers, are saturated with an awareness of irrational evil.

A modern theologian has lamented that there are times when it would seem that God is fishing with a line and the devil with a net.

Lance Morrow, journalist, author and acute observer of the modern scene, has undertaken a formidable task: to understand and describe the nature of evil in its many forms. In his erudite, yet accessible reflections and reports there are no quick answers to the complex questions he raises: Are there evil nations? Are citizens responsible for the evil acts committed by their governments? Does the nature of evil vary from culture to culture? What are the basic religious responses? Is it possible to commit evil deeds in the name of goodness? Why do some people derive pleasure from evil? Why is evil committed against children unforgivable?

Although the author's concern is with major evils, he does not overlook the smaller scale evils that bedevil our age – from school shootings to corporate fraud. Consider, Morrow says, that in Greek mythology, a spurned Medea murders her two sons. In British Columbia, a seemingly demented father murders his six children.

In the end, Morrow concludes that the real struggle in the world "may not be between good and evil, but rather between hope and evil. Hope seems more active and creative than the somewhat nebulous 'good.' Hope aspires; good has arrived. Good, like God, lives outside time; hope keeps people alive, moving forward, inside time. As long as hope remains healthy, it is a match for evil; about good, no one can be so sure."

This slender volume is a wise, provocative and probing investigation of the all too familiar malign side of human nature. It provides readers with a necessary, if somewhat muddled, moral compass for our troubled and uncertain age.

The weekly Torah portion online

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

This Sunday, we observe Simchat Torah, the celebration of the yearly completion of the Torah reading, and immediately start over with Breishit. Many people find this holiday an ideal time to commit to more Torah study. Although nothing can take the place of a session with a rabbi or a friend, the Internet has marvelous resources where you can learn more about the Torah portion of the week, the parshat hashavuah.

There are two different ways to join in the learning. You can either visit a Web site regularly and check out that week's material and archived resources from previous years. Or you can join a list. Once you sign up, that week's commentary will be automatically e-mailed to you. Some lists are one-way only – that is, you receive a weekly mailing. Others allow you to respond and offer your own insights. Most of these lists are "moderated," which means there is someone in charge who makes sure the correspondence remains on topic – and civil.

Commentaries are available from almost every perspective imaginable, from Rabbi Shlomo Riskin's weekly Shabbat Shalom [http://www.ohrtorahstone.org.il/parsha] to Torah Hayim: Living Torah Study for Reform Jews [http://uahc.org/torah] and the writings of Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America [http://learn. jtsa.edu/topics/ parashah/].

You can also study the parshah from a women's perspective [http://www.jewishamerica.com/ja/features/parshaw.cfm] or from a Reconstructionist perspective [http://www.jrf.org/reco ndt/]. And if you'd like to learn while on the run, download the Tanach Study Centre's weekly commentary onto your palm pilot [http: //www.tana :h.org].

To see a list of what's out there, visit Eric Simon's Torahnet Page. Another favourite list is not only an impressive piece of work but also has a great name: The Electronic Torah Warehouse [http://eparsha.com]. The warehouse is the work of Joshua Cypess, a rabbinic student and educational co-ordinator at Yeshiva University. (Bonus: check out his cheeky answers in his site's Frequently Asked Questions section.) [http://www.torahnet.org/]

Shamash: The Jewish Network offers a very handy feature at its divrei Torah site. You can search by keyword through all of its 36 commentaries. The next time you are giving a speech on a particular topic, type in a keyword and check out the wisdom of the rabbis [http://shamash.org /tanach/dvar.shtml].

For many years, the late professor Nehama Leibowitz distributed weekly pamphlets or gilyonot with Torah insights to her students. You can read them in English or in Hebrew [http:// www.jafi.org.il/education/torani]. For more commentaries in Hebrew, visit Bar Ilan University's site [http://www.biu.ac.il/JH/Parasha] and a site called Kipa [http://www.kipa.co.il/ magazine/main .asp?cat=8]. Remember, if you have trouble reading Hebrew online, download the free Mozilla browser that displays Hebrew [http://www.mozilla.org/].

If you prefer to listen to a lecture rather than read one, try out "613.org: The First World-Wide Jewish Audio Since Mount Sinai" [http://www. 613.org/parasha.html]. According to the site, there are more than 250 classes by speakers from all around the world. Over at ThinkJewish International, you can listen to chassidic insights [http://www.think jewish.com] and thoughts from the Darchei Noam Institution [http://www.darchenoam.org/ articles/audio/au_home.htm].

As you'd expect, some parshat hashavuah sites have kids in mind. In Kinder Torah, Simcha Groffman gives suggestions to parents for parshah lessons they may want to pass on to their children [http://makeashorterlink.com/?U10625B16]. For example, parshat Breishit tells how the world was created after God spoke of His intention to do so. Kinder Torah explains how our use of words is also important – for example, when we speak kindly, we can create a world of good.

For something different, go to Torah Tidbits [http://www.ou.org/torah/tt/] and click on Parsha Pix & Stats. Every week, you'll get a screen full of pictures that relate to the Torah portion. Sometimes that relationship is straightforward; sometimes it is a bit cryptic. And Torah Tots' Parsha on Parade has kid-friendly explanations and colouring pages that can be printed out and decorated [http://www.torahtots. com/parsha.htm].

So learn, discuss and enjoy. But as you travel the Jewish Highway, please remember that what you print will often include God's name. Respect the sanctity of the material.

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 8% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity	*If income postponed 1 year gross equivalent yield 9.93%
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	21,870
Taxable Income	10,000	3,220
Tax (46%)	4,600	1,481
After Tax Income	5,400	20,839
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,222
Spendable Income	5,400	9,167
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	8.49%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000	(This is an illustration only; rates will vary)
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Some recent cases closed:
$1,000,000 Annuity — Female, Age 78 - Gross Equivalent Yield 9.87%
$200,000 Annuity — Joint Life - Male 79, Female 74 - Gross Equivalent Yield 9.23%

Englander promotes social justice in new role

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Cheryl Englander, the newly appointed national social action co-ordinator for Canadian Council of Reform Judaism (CCRJ), says she has been moving toward this position for years.

"Social justice is an issue dear to my heart. I have a background at Holy Blossom Temple, and its members are very involved in social action," said Englander, who also serves as assistant director of ARZA Canada, the association of Reform Zionists.

Cheryl Englander

A resident of Mississauga since 1975 – her husband is Rabbi Lawrence Englander of the city's Solel Congregation – she was among the founders of Foodpath, an interfaith food bank that the synagogue created with Streetsville United Church and the Bahai Congregation. When the same founders established Pathway, a non-profit housing corporation, she participated in a program to supply window coverings for the first tenants.

Other synagogue programs Englander has participated in include a group to sponsor Indo-Chinese refugees in the mid-'80s. She also chaired the congregation's caring community group and started a sandwich-making project for its monthly street van run with Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish & Humanitarian Relief Committee.

"Although I'm still learning the ropes at CCRJ, I have been moving in this direction for a long time. My immediate predecessors set excellent examples; they left me with very large footsteps to follow."

In her new position, Englander is responsible for co-ordinating committees at about 25 congregations across the country. Local initiatives are similar to those at Solel Congregation, and national issues include Campaign 2000, the campaign to end child poverty.

"That issue is something we still have to face. [The congregations] need to look at ways to unite and attack child poverty."

Since Solel set up the food bank in Mississauga, she said, "we have had the dubious honour of running the largest food bank in Canada. Out of that project came subsidized housing, because the root of hunger is the high cost of housing."

Englander also recently decided to lend support to the Ontarians with Disabilities Act, a coalition of individuals and community organizations who have united to secure the passage in Ontario of a new law that would achieve a barrier-free society for people with disabilities.

"I would like to see educational programs that provide congregations with ways to advocate for a barrier-free Ontario."

Promoting ties with Israel is another issue dear to her heart, says Englander, who has visited several of the country's social justice organizations.

"Our feeling is that all [Jews] are responsible for one another. We need to develop ties in terms of education, and we need to develop physical ties by encouraging people to visit Israel."

Online courses offered for Jewish educators

Longtime educator Alan Weisner says he's been astounded by the results after he decided recently to eliminate regular tests and quizzes in his Bible classes at Cohen-Hillel Academy, a co-ed day school north of Boston.

"There are no more disputes with kids about how they got a grade, and almost no phone calls from parents about grades," he says.

Best of all, students are learning more and retaining more information.

Weisner credits the better methods to gauge student learning that he discovered in "Models of Assessment," one of several online classes for educators at Jewish schools offered by JSkyway (www.jkyway.com), a U.S-based professional development service created in 1999 by the Nash Family Foundation, Jewish Family & Life! and Jewish Education Service of North America (JESNA).

Its courses aim to combine educational theory with tools that are immediately applicable in the classroom.

JSkyway's fall semester runs Oct. 23 to Dec. 23 with four classes taught by leading educators: "Skills for Effective Teaching," "Models of Assessment," "New Technologies for Jewish Learning," and "Developmental Issues in Adolescence."

The cost per course is $100 (US), with discounts available for groups and early registrants.

Courses can be accessed online 24 hours a day from any computer with an Internet connection. Material is added weekly to each course so that participants have seven days to read the material, complete assignments and participate in online discussions.

The courses are accredited by Hebrew College in Newton, Mass., a member of the New England Association of Schools and Colleges, to be used toward continuing education units.

To register or learn more, call 617-581-6831, or visit www.jskyway.com.

Retirement project furthers educator's focus on continuity

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Hopefully, when Rabbi Abraham Soffer finishes his memoirs, there will be a chapter about the genealogy of his name.

Perhaps we'll read about his uncle Avraham – his mother's brother – who died in 1929 when Arab rioters attacked the Jewish settlement in Hebron, killing 67 and wounding 60 more.

Maybe he'll tell us about his grandfather, on his father's side, who arrived in Israel 300 years ago with followers of the Vilna Gaon. Was he part of the group that travelled with the learned Rabbi Eliyahu of Vilna, or did he travel 10 years after the Gaon died, when many of the Torah scholar's students settled in the Holy Land?

"The family's last name originated from this ancestor, because he was the chronicler for the group," Rabbi Soffer said. "And 'soffer' means 'scribe' in Hebrew."

Since his retirement from Associated Hebrew Day Schools this past June, the former educational director has completed more than 25 pages of his family memoirs.

Rabbi Abraham Soffer

The educator, who has touched the lives of more than 15,000 students during a teaching career that began in 1960, said that Jewish continuity depends on Jewish education.

Besides his own history, Rabbi Soffer talks proudly about his graduates who have gone on to Jewish high schools, and about traditional homes that have been maintained because of the strength of a Jewish education.

"This past year, 80 per cent of the Associated graduating class went on to the Community Hebrew Academy, Ulpanat Orot or Or Chaim," he said.

Although this marks a drop from the previous year's 94 per cent, Rabbi Soffer noted the overall numbers represent a real achievement for him. Only 52 per cent of the graduating class went on to Jewish high schools when he arrived in Toronto from New York 17 years ago.

These days, "Associated starts with about 250 students and around 190 graduate each year," Rabbi Soffer said.

A double curriculum gives students an academic advantage, he believes, but Jewish schools also face the challenge of preparing kids to face non-academic anti-Israel and anti-Semitic campus events.

"These days, our kids need to be better prepared to explain the Jewish perspective," Rabbi Soffer said. However, he suggested that Jewish kids may also be choosing not to get involved because they don't want to be as violent as the Arab students on university campuses.

Born in 1938, the sixth generation Israeli remembers the 1948 War of Independence, when Jerusalem was under siege and his father prepared food for soldiers in the nascent Israeli army.

The 10-year-old attended elementary school in Jerusalem and went on to the midrashiya in Pardes Chana. He moved to the United States to attend a yeshiva in Brooklyn, N.Y. In 1960, Rabbi Soffer graduated from Yeshiva Torah V'Daat with his smichah, from Brooklyn College with his BA and from Hebrew Teachers' College with a teaching certificate.

After working in various New York Jewish day and afternoon schools, he became a principal of the Solomon Schechter School in New York before he was hired by Associated in 1986.

With his wife Shoshana, who is now a Grade 1 Judaic studies teacher at Associated, Rabbi Soffer moved to Toronto with their three children, Tamar, Chava and Samuel.

Writing his memoirs has become part of his belief in continuity. "I don't want my children to be left with gaping holes in their family history," he said.

Rabbi Soffer will be honoured at a tribute dinner Thursday Oct. 30 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Singer uses music to 'bring happiness to others'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

How many people would give up the chance of a successful show business career for the life of an Orthodox wife, mother and grandmother in Jerusalem?

Toronto-born Barbara Gryfe Hakuk did just that. After singing on television, radio and in concerts with such entertainers as Harry Belafonte, Sam Levenson and Sammy Davis Jr., she retired with her husband Yaakov to Jerusalem, where she has lived for 31 years.

In Toronto recently to visit her mother and attend several family affairs, she told The CJN she has always sung, along with her father and brother of Gryfe bagel fame.

When she was nine, she sang at her brother Moishe's bar mitzvah. She so impressed orchestra leader Bill Berle that he gave her her first voice training and let her sing with his orchestra.

She appeared on the Tiny Talent Time show and Uncle Jerry's Club, where the composer of the nostalgic My Mother's Sabbath Candles told her that she sang it better than anyone else – including Sophie Tucker.

Other exposure followed – at a club in Greenwich Village in New York, at Toronto's Crest Theatre, on CBC television with Juliette and on Richard Tucker's Search for Talent commercials.

She even recorded a record album, What the World Needs Now, which was sponsored by the CBC.

She was offered a record contract with Columbia Records, if she would only come to Hollywood, but here the story took an unexpected twist.

Barbara Gryfe Haduk

Hakuk, who had attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), found the idea "didn't turn me on; in fact the lifestyle turned me off completely.

"You have to be what the public wants you to be, not what you really are."

At 16, she had gone on a trip to Israel. "I fell in love with Israel."

Every summer, she went back, singing for the Israel air force orchestra, and appearing on Israeli TV with such stars as Yehoram Gaon and Uri Zohar, now a haredi rabbi.

In 1972, just when she was offered the Hollywood record contract, she met her husband, Yaakov, an Orthodox man from Jerusalem. And that was that. "I decided that what God wants, that's what will be."

In addition to raising her five children, now ranging in age from 15 to 29, she became an English teacher.

With her children grown, she felt ready to resume her musical career, but there were difficulties. Having become completely integrated into the haredi world, she could no longer sing before men, dress in anything provocative or perform on Shabbat or holy days.

She began to hold concerts for women only, where she encouraged members of the audience to come on stage and join her. Their singing, she said, helped them deal with fear, illness, happiness.

"You can see how the power of music affects people," Hakuk said.

Recently, she issued a CD, Then and Now, which is partly an update of her original tape, What the World Needs Now, and partly new music. While she was in Toronto, she gave a concert to benefit Na'amat day care centres in Israel.

"We are told that it is a mitzvah to live b'simchah, with joy," she mused.

God gave her the gift of singing, she said. "Why? So that I could share it and use it to praise Him and bring happiness to others."

Hadassah-WIZO gearing up for 79th annual bazaar

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto Hadassah-WIZO has been gearing up for its 79th annual bazaar since just after the close of its 2002 fundraiser.

"Three days after [last year's bazaar], we signed the contract for this year's site, the Better Living Centre at Exhibition Place," says Terry Sulley, publicity chair for the bazaar and and a past chair of the event.

A highlight of the Oct. 29 sale is a fashion auction featuring vintage and haute couture classics from local personalities, including fashion reporter Jeanne Beker, who will MC the proceedings.

Also on the schedule are cooking demonstrations with celebrity chefs from television and print media.

"The bazaar is something that unites the whole organization. People who we have not seen all year come out and help," said Sulley.

She said member Betty Chousky, 93, not only works at the bazaar every year, she also runs the depot where all donated merchandise is kept. "She spends months at the warehouse sorting donations."

Members work hard at getting donations, "and it's always by guess and by golly what we're going to have to sell," Sulley said.

"Always popular is our fix-it booth, which features such items as carpet ends, taps, tiles – anything for the house.

"Shoppers also clamour to our men's fashion boutique, and booths that carry new and gently used clothing items, including adult and children's clothing, shoes accessories and even wedding dresses," she said.

Money raised at the bazaar, which attracts more than 10,000 shoppers each year, will go to the trauma unit at Hadsassah Medical Centre and the breast cancer clinic at the Assaf Harofeh Hospital, both in Israel, and the trauma unit at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre in Toronto.

MEMORIAL SERVICE: Canadian Society for Yad Vashem held its annual memorial service on erev Yom Kippur at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial at Earl Bales Park. Included in the program were candlelighting and wreath-laying ceremonies, as well as a tribute to the artist who designed the memorial, Ernest Raab, who died recently at age 77. Correction to educational injustice is required

By SEYMOUR EPSTEIN & BAILA LUBEK

Seymour Epstein, Vice President, Jewish Education, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Baila Lubek, Chair, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

As we reflect on the Liberal victory in the October 2nd provincial election from the perspective of Jewish education, one issue comes to mind. The last Ontario government established an Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC) that returned to parents of day school children some of their education tax dollars. That law is still in effect and in 2003 amounts to a maximum of $1400 per child.

This law corrected a long-standing injustice in Ontario education and brought Ontario into a league of progressive jurisdiction worldwide where government funding for Jewish day schools is the norm.

We sincerely hope that the EETC can remain in place because it is part of a just society that Ontario should be. If, however, the new government has another way to maintain the just distribution of education tax funds, it is our hope that we can work with them on a smooth and fair transition.

Nothing changes the fact that the pre-EETC era discriminated against non-Catholic faith-based schools, and that stain on Ontario's moral cloth must never return.

Our new advocacy organization. What it means for Canadian Jewry.

On September 30, the Board of Directors of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) ushered in a sweeping overhaul of Jewish advocacy in Canada, with the establishment of CIJA – the Canadian Council for Israel & Jewish Advocacy. The following is a step-by-step explanation of this historic new entity.

Q. What is the purpose of CIJA?

A. CIJA will oversee Jewish community advocacy in Canada for both domestic issues and issues related to Israel.

Q. What will happen to existing organizations?

A. The Canada Israel Committee (CIC), which strongly advocates on Israel's behalf in Canada, will still be the community's advocacy and communication arm in charge of Canada's relationship with Israel and strengthening Canadian support for Israel. Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the voice of Canadian Jewry since 1919, is the advocacy and communication arm of the community on issues related to the quality of Jewish life.

Q. How can community members become involved in this new advocacy structure?

TERRORISM IS NEVER JUSTIFIED
SAVE THE STA E OF OR WILL XT
PALESTINIAN HOLY PK MURDER OF J S
CIJA will strengthen Jewish advocacy efforts in Canada.

A. A new membership organization – CIJA PAC (Public Affairs Committee) – is being created to mobilize citizens across the country to take action in support of the community's advocacy agenda.

Shoel Silver, President, UIA Federations Canada.

Q. How will all these organizations relate to each other?

A. CIJA will oversee all three organizations: Canada Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress and CIJA PAC. CIJA will also support advocacy programs on campuses across Canada, in conjunction with local Hillel organizations.

Q. Who will run CIJA?

A. A new Chief Executive Officer will be hired, who will report to a CIJA Board of 18-22 community members, in consultation with a Community Council.

Q. How was CIJA created?

A. CIJA was established by UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), representing Jewish Federations across the country and their 70,000 UJC/CJA donors. The impetus for the establishment of CIJA came from the Israel Emergency Cabinet, a nationwide group of committed volunteer leaders in response to emerging world trends and the continuing crisis in Israel. GPC International Public Affairs and Communications worked with the Cabinet leadership, consulting with communities, agencies, governments and politicians to develop the re-structuring plan.

Q. Why is CIJA necessary?

A. CIJA is a response to the need for expanded, targeted, coordinated Canadian Jewish advocacy, Israel's situation in a dramatically changed world and new Canadian demographic trends.

The education tax credit: what's ahead?

By BRUCE KURTA

Dalton McGuinty plans to repeal the tax credit for parents of day school children.

One important education question is on the minds of many Jewish community members after the Ontario provincial election: where do we go from here? Premier elect Dalton McGuinty has promised to repeal the tax credit for parents who send their children to day schools once he takes office.

In the immediate aftermath of the election, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region (CJCONT), in conjunction with UJA Federations across Ontario sent McGuinty a letter both congratulating him and expressing community concerns. The organizations are asking the new Liberal government to consider all policy options that exist for solving the problem of funding for Ontario's non-Catholic religious schools.

"Mr. McGuinty has said that tax credits are contrary to the Liberal party's philosophy. If that's the case, it is incumbent on Mr. McGuinty to go back to the drawing board and think of an acceptable alternative so that he does not perpetuate inequity," said Ed Morgan, Chair of CJCONT.

Marshall Kesten was Chair of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education when the Equity in Education Tax Credit was first introduced. He cannot believe that Ontario will again provide free education to one religious group while ignoring the needs of other religious groups.

"The tax credit," he said, "rectified an historic discriminatory position that the government of Ontario had taken and that was confirmed by the august body of the United Nations. We hope and trust that they [the Liberal government] will find some other mechanism to fund the secular part of our studies."

"Day school tuitions are an increasing burden on our parents. It is clearly discriminatory for McGuinty to repeal the EETC with no alternative plan in place," said CJCONT Executive Director, Bernie Farber.

Robin Hershkop, a parent with three children in the day school system and a fourth entering in two years, says that it is now a time for re-evaluating their family's available finances. Like so many other parents, sending their children to day school is not an option - it is something that has to be done.

"This has changed our way of thinking about how we're going to budget, not just for this year but for the next four years [until the next election]," she said. They budgeted for increases in tuition but they also budgeted for the tax credit.

"I can't send them to their extracurricular activities and we can't go away like we were planning to. This change is going to definitely affect our lifestyle," she added.

Campaign passes $35 million mark

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

The Chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, Allan Silber and Richard Venn, are commending a deeply committed core of canvassers – the men and women conducting one-on-one conversations with donors – for their strong role in propelling the campaign to the $35 million mark.

Campaign gifts acquired by 600 campaign volunteers, representing a broad spectrum of professions, have increased by as much as 15% over last year, as is the case with the Lion of Judah Division. UJA's Health Services Division is showing an increase of 12%, followed by the Real Estate Division at 11%, and the Young Adult Division, at more than 10%.

"Our campaigners bring enthusiasm and a deep knowledge of the issues, which donors understand clearly this year," says Venn.

Contributions to Campaign 2004 over and above funds required for core needs will provide additional assistance to victims of terror, help to preserve Israel's deteriorating social service system, fight a worldwide wave of anti-Semitism and educate students to answer those who preach anti-Israel hatred.

"These campaign volunteers are extraordinary. They give of their time and effort. They are committed and believe in the cause," adds Silber.

Among them is Sandra Waldman, Chair of the Women's Campaign & Advocacy Atarah Division with Yetta Bregman, who considers being involved in the process a rewarding venture.

"My family always donates money to the campaign, but that's the easy part. Rolling up your sleeves and actually being part of UJA is a rewarding experience," says Waldman. "The people I've called have been remarkably responsive and warm, and they've all either maintained their gifts or have increased them. They all know the importance of this campaign – I haven't really had to 'sell' anyone so far."

For Dan Rabino-vitch, who works within the Young Adult Division; nothing surpasses volunteer work for UJA.

"I've canvassed for many causes earlier in my life, but to canvass on behalf of Israel and the Jewish people in general makes me extremely passionate about this work," says Rabinovitch. "Since I believe so much in this cause, I also feel a lot of pressure because the better I am, the better it is for the lives of Israelis. The people I've talked to have been great. They seem to have no problem making pledges because they realize the challenges faced by Israelis and our community today."

A real home for Israel's vulnerable children

When 29-year-old Tali Geffen, a social worker from Be'er Sheva, was asked to use her education and talents to better the lives of Israel's children, she didn't hesitate.

Today, Geffen, who attained her Masters in Social Work from Ben Gurion University, and is currently completing a second degree at Tel Aviv University, is one of 250 staff members at Orr Shalom, a collection of 26 group homes throughout Israel from Eilat to Haifa housing more than 300 youngsters.

The purpose of Orr Shalom, which translates to "Light of Peace," is to establish therapeutic family homes for "at-risk" Israeli children who have suffered severe physical and/or psychological abuse and neglect.

The homes act as an alternative to large institutions where children have the opportunity to encounter positive family experiences - unavailable in their natural parents' homes - in addition to receiving intensive professional psychological care.

"In every Orr Shalom home, there are two foster parents and their biological children, a teacher, a social worker and a home manager," says Geffen. "Normally the kids would get the opportunity to go to art classes, or to ride horses, but this year it has been difficult due to budget cuts to Israel's social services."

Orr Shalom's children are found when Israeli welfare agencies are alerted to children living in unhealthy and precarious conditions at home by teachers, counselors or concerned neighbours. Orr Shalom is then called in to conduct an interview and assessment of these children, many of whom have been beaten and have been the victims of incest.

In every Orr Shalom children's home, there are 11 children – boys and girls – from the age of 5 to 18. Geffen works in one of Orr Shalom's homes for adolescent girls which houses seven youngsters, age 13-18.

Tali Geffen

"It's heartbreaking to see these beautiful children who have suffered so much abuse," says Geffen. "There is one girl in my home who has especially touched my heart. She is 15, and when she was only two, her parents divorced. Her father was a very violent man who would beat her and her mother. Finally, the mother divorced him, but then, the problems began all over again when her new stepfather began raping the young girl. That went on for five years. She continues to receive much psychiatric treatment today."

The ongoing Palestinian violence against Israel has not made the lives of Orr Shalom's residents any easier.

"This constant violence for the past three years has caused even more psychological problems for many of these kids," says Geffen. "When they are frightened, their anxiety levels rise and make an already bad situation worse."

Even for a well-educated and savvy social worker like Geffen, seeing these badly damaged children day in and day out can take its toll.

"Definitely, it is hard on me, on all the staff, at times," she says. "We have to contain so much anger, rage and pain, seeing what these children have had to go through in their young lives, and that's not always easy. Still, I've been doing this for four years, and I hope to be doing it well into the future. The work, while difficult, is also so satisfying and fulfilling. When you see our kids graduate from high school and begin to lead healthy new lives, you can't imagine the pride I feel. These kids represent much of the future of Israel and we must help heal their wounds."

Gift of a soul led to development of civilization, scientist says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Adam did not become truly human until God gave him a neshamah, a soul. And that neshamah, says Gerald Schroeder, is not only what distinguished him from all other beings, it is also what gave the world a moral element.

That moral element, Schroeder said at a recent lecture given for Torah In Motion, is what enabled civilization to develop.

Schroeder, an MIT trained scientist, has earned two doctorates – in earth sciences and in nuclear physics. When he moved to Israel, he joined the Weizmann Institute of Science and then the Volcani Research Institute. He also has a laboratory at Hebrew University.

As well, Schroeder has studied extensively under Torah scholars rabbis Chaim Brovender and Noah Weinberg.

The divine gift of a soul is what distinguished Adam from all other beings that came before, Schroeder said. And there were sentient beings before Adam, he stressed.

This, for Schroeder, resolves the problem of the Jewish tradition that believes creation occurred 5,764 years ago, when charcoal cave paintings have been reliably dated as being 30,000 years old.

The act of creation, what scientists call "the big bang," created only energy, he said. Somehow, "no one knows how it happened," the energy "knew how to make matter. The matter changed into simple particles, which pulled together to become rocks and water, which became alive, developed into a brain, and eventually to the mind."

There was only one act of creation, he said, a conclusion agreed to by both the laws of physics and the scholar Nachmanides. This means that the potential for everything was already present at that creation, and everything came into being at the same time.

According to geological evidence, Schroeder said, until eight million years ago, Africa was covered by trees. At that time, the Afro-Syrian rift formed – a valley extending from Tanzania to Turkey. This isolated the eastern third of Africa, even changing the weather patterns, and that eastern third became grassland.

When an area is full of trees, Schroeder said, there is no evolutionary benefit to be gained from standing erect; however, the benefit exists when there is grassland, because you can see farther and plan your actions better. Over some five million years, he said, the four legged creatures in the eastern area became two legged, leading to the development of man.

"The closest animal to man is the chimpanzee," he said. "Its DNA differs from [that of] human beings by only one per cent, but that one per cent involves 30 million differences."

For any physiological change to occur, he said, there must be a genetic mutation. There must also be a being with a similar mutation with which the first being can mate. The only way this could occur, he said, is if a male had a harem. When he fertilizes the members of the harem, eventually two or more offspring with the same mutation will themselves mate, creating the genetic change.

And that, Schroeder said, is exactly how it happened: beings developed that looked exactly like humans but had no God-given soul.

This notion leaves the door open to the question as to whether Adam, the first human with a soul, could have had a physical ancestor. The answer given increasingly, although not publicly, is that indeed he could have.

"The Torah and the Talmud both strongly hint at that," Schroeder said, as did Maimonides in his Guide for the Perplexed.

Archeological discoveries hint at a major change in the world, about 5,500 years ago – around the time of Adam, in other words. The most important innovation, Schroeder said, was the development of writing, which, he said, arose from the need to record economic transactions. Pictures, he explained, don't really say anything – a drawing of a horse on a cave wall, for instance, doesn't tell you who bred the horse, how much it cost or what it was used for.

At the same time, he said, division of labour became possible within groups and between urban and rural dwellers. With the appearance of the neshamah, "clans could live together without eating each other."

This ability of people to feel a sense of unity is "the manifestation of God," he concluded.

University of Toronto celebrates Russian culture

By SVETLANA BARKIN
Special to The CJN

Ask any Jew from anywhere in the former Soviet Union about what it was like to live there as a Jew, and you will likely hear similar stories: stories of losing religion, forgetting the prayers, being unable to attend shul, keeping some traditions in spite of the Communist regime.

It is these stories that moved three Jewish enthusiasts and professionals to create an interdisciplinary symposium and mini-festival called "Soviet & Kosher: A Century of Jewish Culture in Russia." This unique two-day event, to be held Oct. 26 and Oct. 27, is jointly organized by University of Toronto's Centre for Russian and East European Studies (CREES), its Jewish studies program, its department of Germanic languages and literatures and its department of Slavic languages and literatures.

The celebration begins Saturday, Oct. 25, at 8 p.m. with a concert called "Three Generations of Soviet Jewish Song." During the two-day symposium, experts will share insights into Russian and Soviet Jewish literature, theatre, movies, music and visual arts. It will also feature discussions of Jewish life in the former Soviet Union, survival and continuity of Jewish culture and aspects of Soviet Jewish identity. The festival will also present a screening of rare Soviet films and two unusual musical events – the aforementioned concert profiling 20th-century composers of Russian and Yiddish songs, and a second celebrating Soviet klezmer music.

In a joint interview, Prof. Peter Solomon, the head of the Centre for Russian and East European Studies at U of T's Munk Centre for International Studies, and Prof. Anna Shternshis, the driving force behind the creation of a Yiddish-language course in U of T's department of Germanic languages, showed their enthusiasm for Yiddish and Russian Jewish culture.

"It is extremely important for the western world to recognize where Soviet Jews are coming from," said Shternshis, who graduated from the Historical Judaica program at Moscow's Historical Archiving Institute and received a PhD in modern languages and literatures from Oxford University.

Drawing on her own experiences as a Soviet Jew, she said, "People knew they're Jewish by passport, by the nationality definition of the Soviet regime, but they remained undefined when faced with religious reality of Judaism, such as keeping kosher or attending the synagogue."

Shternshis said her main area of interest is Soviet Yiddish culture, which flourished between 1917 and 1945. According to her research, during that time, 54 per cent of the Soviet Jewish population spoke Yiddish. Ironically, the Soviet regime, which detested Jews, can be credited for allowing Yiddish culture to flourish. Shternshis said during those brief 28 years, numerous Jewish theatres and jazz bands whose repertoire was in Yiddish toured the country. World War II was responsible for ending these tours, she said, since most of the Yiddish-speaking population was killed in the Holocaust.

Solomon said the idea for the event came during a Rosh Hashanah dinner in 2002, when he, Shternshis and Prof. Sterling Beckwith of York University's department of music met to discuss Soviet Jewish culture and its impact on Russian mainstream culture.

Solomon said their timing was perfect, just when U of T's Chancellor Jackman Program for the Arts issued a substantial grant to support various university ventures in the arts.

When describing the event's numerous highlights, Solomon acknowledged the efforts of Beckwith, who chose the musical compositions that will be presented in the two concerts.

The first concert will take place Oct. 25 at 8 p.m. at Walter Hall, 80 Queen's Park Cr. It will be devoted to Jewish motifs in Russian classical music and jazz, and for the first time ever, the audience will hear Russian composer Dmitry Shostakovich's (1906-1975) Jewish Cycle with the original Yiddish texts, Solomon and Beckwith said. To their knowledge, this is the first time Shostakovich's music and Yiddish original words will be performed together.

The second concert, "Klezmer Behind the Iron Curtain," will take place Sunday, Oct. 26, at 8 p.m., at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W. It will feature Soviet klezmer music, which was performed secretly at various events and in various regions of the former Soviet Union.

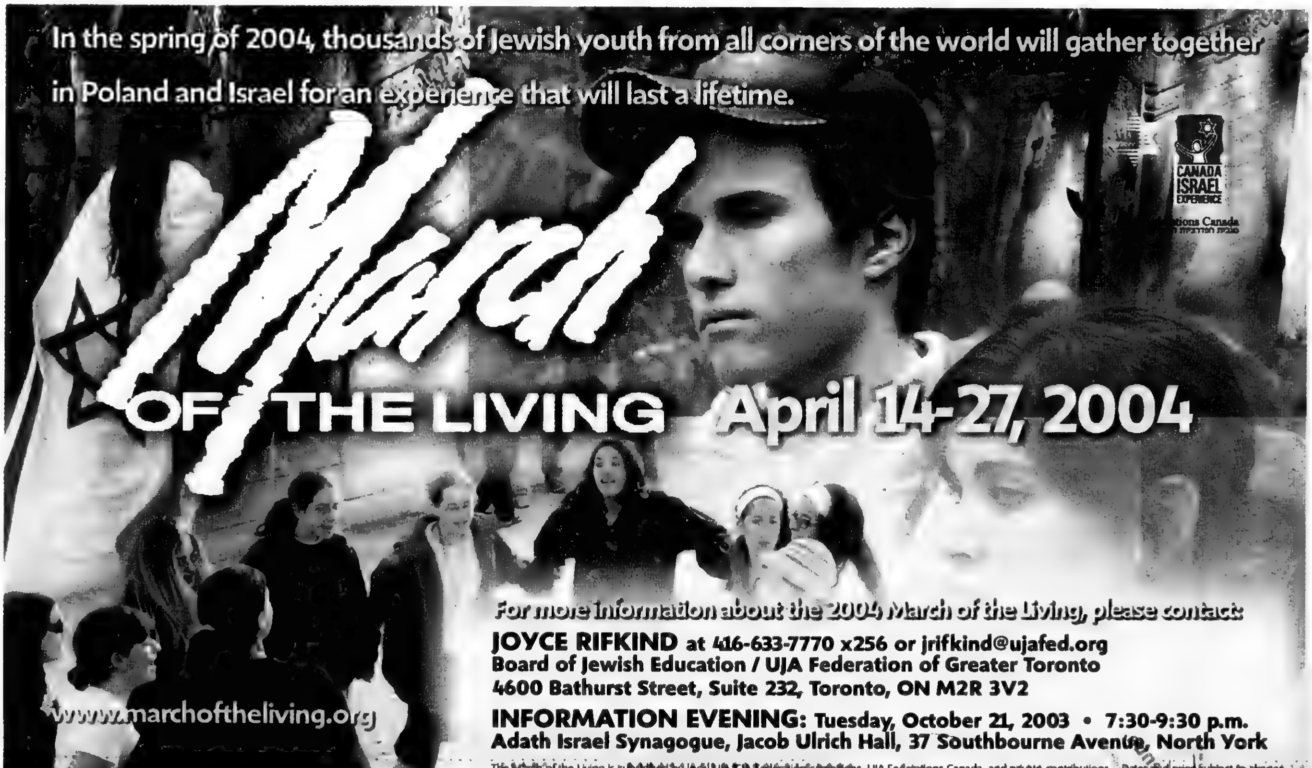
(My own parents and grandparents still remember how their relatives would secretly search for klezmer musicians for weddings. And they would come: old men in worn-out suits, with their violins and flutes, and capture the hearts of their audiences. My father recalls attending a family wedding sometime in the 1950s with a chuppah and a klezmer band.)

On Oct. 26, the upbeat Yiddish party tunes will be presented by Michael Alpert and the Red Army Klezmer Band.

The actual symposium begins Oct. 26 at 9 a.m. and continues to Oct. 27 until 6 p.m. That night will feature a screening of Seekers of Happiness. Thomas Lahunsen, speaking on "Jewish Themes in Soviet Theatre," will introduce this rare Soviet Jewish film to the audience. Both Solomon and Shternshis said audience participation is an essential part of the event and are urging members of the Jewish community to attend.

"Academic-oriented conferences don't interest the public too much," Solomon said. "But if an academic event can be broadened to include several areas of general interest, it would become a success. We truly hope that everybody who attends 'Soviet & Kosher' will find that special meaning of this event for himself."

For concert tickets, call the hotline at 416-352-5967. For event information, call 416-946-8994, visit www.artsandscience.utoronto.ca or e-mail janet.hyer@utoronto.ca.



In the spring of 2004, thousands of Jewish youth from all corners of the world will gather together in Poland and Israel for an experience that will last a lifetime.

Wilder looks back at tenure as head of CIC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When he was a young lawyer back in 1973, Joe Wilder temporarily put his practice on the backburner and went out and canvassed for Israel.

The Yom Kippur War had just concluded and Wilder believed that following its victory, Israel needed financial assistance as well as moral and political support.

Joe Wilder

Like other like-minded individuals in Winnipeg, Wilder went door to door in Jewish and non-Jewish neighbourhoods to do what he could to create goodwill for the Jewish state.

Those efforts eventually led to creation of an organized committee that evolved over the course of time into the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). Since then, Wilder has held a variety of Jewish organizational positions, most recently as chair of the CIC, which has become the Jewish community's designated lobbying arm on Israel.

Although the CIC has had to face crises in the past, the past three years – coinciding almost. to a tee with Wilder's term as chair, which is coming to an end – have been one of the most eventful periods in the organization's history.

Not only has the Palestinian intifadah raged, but Israel has come under withering diplomatic attack at the United Nations and at other international fora. Attacks on Jews have skyrocketed around the world while the media, including news agencies in Canada, have not provided the kind of coverage Wilder believes is fair and balanced.

The government of Canada, for its part, has come under intense criticism from the Jewish community for signing on to UN resolutions that single out Israel for criticism, for funding the UN agency that runs refugee camps in which hatred of Israel is on the school curriculum, and for appearing to buy into rhetoric about a "cycle of violence," which leaves Israel as much to blame for the lack of peace as terrorists.

At the same time, the CIC has found itself at the centre of a community reorganization effort that will see it undergo a change in governance to bring it under the control of a new committee consisting of prominent business people.

Trying to run a law practice and head up an organization with that kind of packed agenda was a little more than he bargained for, Wilder acknowledges. "It made my life change...I went from reasonably busy guy to sometimes frantic."

Wilder believes the CIC's longstanding governing structure – as a partnership of national Jewish organizations – had within it "the seeds of failure." Some of the community's "venerable organizations did not cede the field [for pro-Israel advocacy] entirely and if one partner felt the other partner was speaking out too vociferously, that would come up and the chairman would try to ameliorate the situation."

Despite the internal difficulties the CIC, he said, was able to fulfil its task of "conducting diplomatic relations with the government of Canada. A lot of what we do, we can't trumpet in the newspaper or elsewhere."

The type of quiet diplomacy practiced by the CIC sometimes was at odds with a Jewish public that wanted a more visible and vocal response to Canadian policy. But quiet diplomacy, Wilder said, can produce greater results. "It's important to have relations with people and sit down and explain issues without heat and passion, so people hear and are amenable to persuasion. Relations are crucial."

What's more, Israeli government representatives are not nearly as critical of Canadian foreign policy as are Canadian Jews.

"I have an ongoing battle with foreign affairs on...Canada's voting record at the United Nations, [but] Israelis say, 'don't worry about it so much. Canada is doing other good things for us and these resolutions are not so important'," Wilder stated.

Early in the intifadah, Canada supported a resolution that was critical of Israel and which angered the Jewish community. When the CIC met with Jean Chretien, "the prime minister said 'the minister of health for Israel was just here two days ago and he didn't even mention it. Why are you so exercised by it?'

"I was taken aback. I didn't expect it. I said, 'the minister of Israel is not a constituent of yours. We're talking about Jews who are unhappy.'"

Moreover, Canada does sometimes take Israel's side in international diplomatic fora, he continued. When the United States was not officially present at the infamous UN's human rights conference in Durban, "Canada stepped in and headed off some of the drastic resolutions. Canada does some pretty good things for us and sometime they are forgotten. I'm not satisfied with all Canada has done, but I'm more satisfied than Jews in Britain, France and Germany must be."

Canada played an important role in gaining Israel's admittance to WEOG, the Western Europe and Others Group of the United Nations, a regional grouping that permits Israeli participation in a variety of UN activities.

The CIC's advocacy has also moved Canada's position concerning Israel's defensive responses to terrorist attacks,Wilder said. At the beginning of the intifadah, Canadian officials spoke about "the cycle of violence," which equated Israeli responses to terrorism to the bloody attacks that provoked them.

That usage has changed and Foreign Minister Bill Graham "has indicated to us he understands it's not a cycle of violence," Wilder said.

The CIC remains disappointed about Canada's funding of UNRWA, the UN agency that runs Palestinian refugee camps. "We have an ongoing battle with Canada in that its spending goes into the purchase of those putrid books" which omit Israel in its maps and which "teach hate, vilification of another nation.

"The relationship is not always peaches and cream, but it's an honest and forthright relationship. It's one that works," he said.

The CIC has also had concerns with the media's description of events in the Middle East, in particular with the CBC's coverage. The CIC prepared a dossier which enumerated instances "when the CBC was wrong and we asked them to study it...We asked for fair reporting in the future."

Wilder said that in recent months there appears to be "a distinct change in the CBC's Middle East coverage."

Wilder, whose term in office was to have expired in September, has remained at his post pending implementation of the new governing structure.

"I can't just leave, so I'm anxious for the new set up to be created as soon as possible so we can morph the old CIC into the new one," he said.

Leading cancer researcher dies in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Canada's medical community is mourning the death of Dr. Lyonel Israels, one of Canada's leading cancer researchers, who died recently after an illness of several months.

Dr. Israels, 77, was a noted physician, researcher and teacher who established the medical hematology/oncology program at the the Manitoba Cancer Treatment and Research Foundation – now called CancerCare Manitoba – and was the director of the foundation for 20 years.

He was a co-founder of the Manitoba Institute for Cell Biology and the Manitoba Health Research Council.

Israels also served as a member of the Medical Research Council of Canada, president of the National Cancer Institute of Canada, and chair of the scientific advisory council of the International Agency for Research on Cancer which is based in Lyon, France.

Israels was born in Regina and grew up in rural Saskatchewan. He graduated from the University of Manitoba Medical College in 1949. After post-graduate studies in the United States, England and Switzerland, he returned to Winnipeg to begin his 50-year career in cancer research.

> 'He had a good sense of humour, a brilliant mind'

Dr. Morel Rubinger, a long time colleague of Israels, described him as a mensch who related comfortably to everyone.

"I appreciated especially his enthusiasm for teaching. Many of his students are now professors themselves. He had a good sense of humour and a brilliant mind."

In 1996, the Winnipeg Associates of the Ben-Gurion University recognized Israels' achievements with the establishment of a chair in hematology and oncology in his name at the university. He was also presented at the event with the Negev Award, the university's highest honour.

Other honours he received include the Order of Canada, Captain of the Manitoba Order of the Buffalo Hunt, the St. Boniface General Hospital Research Foundation International Award and, most recently last spring, the University of Manitoba Peter D. Curry Chancellor's Award.

Solel Congregation celebrates 30 years in Mississauga

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When three Jewish families discovered each other at a local Mississauga nursery school 30 years ago, they decided to form an official Jewish presence in the city.

By the time they organized their first meeting, 20 families had joined them, and they formed Solel Congregation, Mississauga's first synagogue.

Rabbi Larry Englander at Solel in 1975.

The small group did not envision, however, that in the next three decades, their active congregation would grow to more than 330 member families.

"We didn't dream we would become grandparents here. We started with little children, and now we're teaching our children's children," said Ella Stoch, a Solel founding member and former education director.

The founding group of families originally formed a congregation rather than a social club, she said, "because it did not take us long to realize that we wanted socialization, a school and a synagogue. We wanted our children to know that what they learned in Hebrew school had meaning in their homes."

Before long, she said, Rabbi Lawrence Englander – known as the singing rabbi because he plays the guitar and sings at every service – started as a part-time student rabbi. When he was ordained two years later, he joined the congregation, which has been in its own building since 1979.

"We all grew up together. When I came as a student, I would stay with congregants in their homes. To this day, we think of ourselves as family," Rabbi Englander said.

Arliene Botnick, Solel's current director of education, and a member since 1975, said that from the outset, members decided to teach their own children.

"We do not bring in outside teachers. We have a one-year training program, so our teachers are home grown," said Botnick, who learned Hebrew from Stoch, and now has a son and daughter teaching in Solel's Hebrew school.

"It is a participatory congregation," said Rabbi Englander. "Everyone works together – adults and children. I still kvell when I walk into the school and see kids and adults learning in the same building.

"We are fostering lifelong learning – that's what it is all about. We are proud to say that 90 per cent of bar/bat mitzvah students stay at Hebrew school until the end of Grade 10."

Having an active congregation in Mississauga, which has about 5,000 Jews – although Solel congregants come from such places as Kitchener/Waterloo, Guelph and Hamilton – creates an opportunity for Jews to be together, Stoch said.

"There is [lots of] spirituality here, because if people want a Jewish environment, they have to come to synagogue. We don't have the wide range of Jewish culture available in some other large cities," she said.

The senior youth group is thriving because it is one of the only places in the area for teens to experience Jewish identity, Stoch said. "It is not the exception to have a teen called to the bimah as part of a service. They feel at home here."

The congregation does face challenges, Rabbi Englander said.

"We offer as many programs as possible in order to keep people involved, but it is harder now than ever to get people out. Young working parents and singles often get lost in the shuffle. We have to make sure we address their needs."

Solel is also looking to expand its building and would like to run the Hebrew school on its own premises, Botnick said.

In addition to serving its congregants, Solel is active in the wider Mississauga community, said Gail Feldman, another founding member.

The synagogue is one of the founders, and is an active supporter, of Foodpath, Mississauga's food bank. It is also a founder and supporter of Pathway, a non-profit housing development, and Pathway Community Programs, a supporting programming arm, she said.

Izzy Asper: philanthropist and renaissance man

As news of his death spread, tributes poured in from around the world. A who's who of Canadian business and political elite attended his funeral at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, including two planeloads of Liberal politicians headed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and MP Paul Martin. Other dignitaries who attended his funeral included Manitoba Lt.-Gov. Peter Liba, Manitoba Premier Gary Doer, Winnipeg Mayor Glen Murray, Canadian Alliance leader Stephen Harper and Israel's ambassador to Canada Haim Divon.

Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center and other Jewish community organizations expressed their sadness at the loss of one of the Jewish community's greatest champions and supporters.

People throughout Winnipeg were shocked and saddened by Asper's death, said his longtime friend and law partner Harold Buchwald. "Everybody, whether they knew him or not, feels really lost. There's just a pall everywhere you go. It's just all over the community. It's overwhelming."

Buchwald, who first met Asper 55 years ago, remembers that even when he was 21 and Asper a teenager, "I knew he was different. He was ambitious, enthusiastic, he was the opposite of a shrinking violet. He had more than the average teenager's curiosity."

During their college years, Buchwald worked as editor and Asper as reporter at the University of Manitoba's student paper, The Manitoban. Asper would later go on to edit the newspaper.

At the same time, they participated in student variety shows and Buchwald recalls Asper as a comedian and humourist. "He was very vibrant, vital guy. He loved challenges and ideas."

As a tax lawyer, Asper became expert in developing novel tax structures and was for a time a tax columnist at the Globe and Mail.

Following the Yom Kippur War of 1973, he and Buchwald were part of a group of Winnipeggers who raised money and garnered political support for Israel. Their informal organization eventually evolved into the Canada-Israel Committee, the community's lobbying arm on Israel.

From 1971 to 1975, Asper led the Manitoba Liberal Party, but he failed to take the party to electoral victory. He left politics for the business world, purchasing the assets of a cross-border television station, KCND, and moving them to Winnipeg, where it broadcast under the call letters CKND.

The station proved popular and marked the start of his entrepreneurial efforts. Along the way, he partnered with fellow Winnipegger Gerry Schwartz in CanWest Capital, a venture capital company. The two parted ways over disagreements in business philosophy and Schwartz moved to Toronto, where he eventually became head of the conglomerate Onex.

Buchwald recalls that Asper was always interested in philanthropy, even devising tax structures to permit clients to give during their lifetimes and even at death.

Asper made major donations to the Jewish community and to the wider community. He gave $10 million to the University of Manitoba's school of business as part of its $30-million campaign. He helped fund a 7,000-seat baseball stadium at the forks of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, and he partially funded the Theatre for Young People. Overall, Asper was believed to have given $100 million in the past four years to support a variety of charities.

David Cohen, executive-director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, said Asper, with a gift of $2 million, was the largest single contributor to the city's Jewish campus, which bears the Asper name and houses a day school, a community centre, a theatre and agency offices. In 2000, he contributed $10 million to the Foundation to fund a number of agencies, including the day school and Jewish Family & Child Service.

Only two months ago, he established the Asper Helping Hand Initiative, which provides emergency interest-free loans of up to $3,000 to students, immigrants and others.

"I think he should be remembered for the fact he was positive in encouraging others to give, no matter their capacity," Cohen said. "He believed there are always people less fortunate and to try to make the community a better place… In the vernacular, he put his money where his mouth was. He was a doer and I think one of his biggest legacies is that he instilled these values in his children."

All three of his children delivered eulogies while one of his grandchildren, Daniel Asper, said "the reason his heart stopped is that he put so much of it into the lives of others."

Rabbi Alan Green, rabbi at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, called him "a giant of the Jewish people. His philanthropy was on an amazing scale. It's just mind-boggling how much he gave away."

With his defence of the State of Israel, "he was a man I looked up to for inspiration," Rabbi Green said.

MP Irwin Cotler, who knew Asper for 35 years and who attended his funeral, called him "a courageous advocate for Israel. He eschewed the politically correct and was courageous in the content and character of his advocacy."

> A courageous advocate for Israel

Asper was a true "renaissance person" who would rightly be remembered for excelling in all of his numerous fields of interest, he said.

Paraphrasing Oliver Wendell Holmes, Cotler said of Asper that "a person who did not share the actions and passions of his time is deemed not to have lived. Asper not only did that, he shaped them."

Sandra Stern, founder of Canadians Against Anti-Semitism, said she did not know Asper personally, but she corresponded with him by e-mail and he advised her on ways of "fight[ing] the same fight" for Israel and against anti-Semitism.

"I am not family or a close friend, but I can tell you I feel devastated by the loss of Izzy Asper. More and more we find ourselves alone and alienated in the world and it is people like Mr. Asper who respectfully respond, encourage and inspire.

"Thank God we have other friends and supporters, Jews and non-Jews, who, if we pull together and replicate only a portion of what Izzy Asper did, we will survive and make this a better world. We only need to act, speak out, write and respond."

Supporting Israel's right to strike

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Globe and Mail has not shied away from criticizing Israel when it thought criticism was warranted, and no doubt, it will do so in the future, even as it supports Israel's basic need for security.

Still, in its editorial "Israel's right to react" (Oct. 7) – written in reaction to Israel's Oct. 5 strike on an abandoned Palestinian terrorist training base near Damascus that was itself in retaliation for a horrific suicide bombing in Haifa the day before – the Globe wrote bluntly and forcefully about Israel's right to strike at those who support and supply terrorist organizations dedicated to killing Israelis: "Despite U.S. pressure since the Sept. 11 attacks, Syria is still believed to be nurturing terrorist killers and their leaders. It cannot hide behind the skirts of national sovereignty. Any country that supports terrorism as shamelessly as Syria has surrendered its right to inviolable borders."

The Globe also upbraided a good chunk of the international community for its hypocritical denunciations of Israel's action.

"What would France do if terrorists supported by Spain were blowing up cafés in Paris every week or so? What would China do if Tibetan terrorists backed by India had carried out scores of suicide attacks in China?"

These are long-overdue but necessary words from the Globe, words that need to be carefully weighed by our political leaders in Ottawa, who affirm Israel's right to self defence in principle but condemn it in practice, especially when, as in the Syrian case, Israel has acted with much restraint (only two Syrians were reportedly injured).

(Speaking of the horrible burden that Israelis live with on a daily basis, one is reminded of New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman's comment on CNBC's Tim Russert Show, [Sept. 14]: "My heart goes out to Israelis. Facing this madness, this kind of threat would make any society crazy.")

In his Oct. 7 column in the Winnipeg Free Press, Samuel Segev also supported Israel's Oct. 5 action against Syria in his look at the strike's broader significance. Reminding his readers that in the last nine months, 120 Israelis have been killed in eight suicide terror attacks (in the last three years, 432 Israelis have been murdered in 103 such attacks), Segev argued that Israel has served notice on regimes that support terrorism against it. Israel "has changed the rules of the game" with such regimes not only in Damascus, but also in Beirut and Tehran – "any country that harbours terrorists, trains them and finances their murderous activities."

In his column "Syria was an alternative to Arafat" (National Post, Oct. 8), David Warren saw less significance in Israel's move on Syria than did Segev. Asserting that Israel never gets praise for its restraint in any event, Warren claimed that Israel only struck Syria because it is too constrained by world opinion to hit the real culprit – Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat himself, who will now exploit Israel's actions to his own advantage.

The near future will likely reveal whether Segev or Warren is correct.

A notable quote from Steve Paikin, host of TVOntario's Diplomatic Immunity, from the Oct. 3 show on "The Arab World Today": "I've been trying for the last five or 10 minutes to get us all to talk about what's happening inside the Arab world and this conversation continually comes back to Israel. And I'm fascinated about the fact that we can't have a conversation about a 250-million person, 22-nation Arab world without getting back to the six-million people who live in Israel."

Paul Michaels is director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee.

A NEW BEGINNING: Am Shalom, Reform Judaism's new congregation in Barrie, Ont., observed the Kol Nidre service in its new synagogue this year. Seen is Rabbi Bernard Baskin, who has led the congregation's High Holy Day Services for the past 15 years in a variety of locations. Dr. Marc Benner, head of Am Shalom's spiritual committee, is affixing a mezuzah in the sanctuary prior to Kol Nidre. Am Shalom's first service in its new home was attended by more than 200 people – the largest gathering of Jews in Simcoe County history! For more information about Am Shalom, call 705-721-6126.

When diets fail...

Wendy Rayner of Newmarket was overweight almost all of her life.

She tried all sorts of diets and gimmicks. "I was on and off Weight Watchers for 30 years. I was always embarrassed about my size."

For most of us, losing weight is an endless battle. Despite our sincerest efforts to stick to a diet, our subconscious acts like the bad guy seducing us into eating half a chocolate cake. But with hypnosis, the struggle can be resolved — and we can begin to see genuine results.

Dr. Patrick Porter, Executive Director of Positive Changes, says that "with hypnosis, we increase the ability to absorb suggestion." Ineffective, destructive behaviour is replaced effortlessly by healthier behaviour and people start to lose weight, stop smoking or reduce stress.

For Wendy Rayner the results were immediate and long lasting. Since starting her hypnosis program in 2001, she shed 45 pounds and has easily maintained her trim figure for over two years.

Many other local people have experienced similar results. Marina Carrott of Toronto now weighs what she did on her wedding day, 19 years ago. "I never felt as if I was on a diet — a good thing because my hobby is cooking. My second favourite thing to do is trying out new restaurants, and I never felt deprived," says Carrott.

Porter explains, "Marina's experience with dieting is not uncommon. Our ingrained habits are stronger than will power. With hypnosis we helped Marina to reprogram her subconscious with the positive habits of a naturally thin person. Once Marina took back control, her weight loss could happen automatically."

גידי קורן וחברים

מסדר כנפיים

חיל האויר הדיח בצדק את החותמים, ואז מיהרו כמה מהם להתחרט. שוב-ביטוי עמוק לכך שבישראל מילה היא לא בהכרח מילה, ואנשים מתפלאים שמילה שלהם נלקחת ברצינות. הגדיל חיל האויר לעשות ושאל את בוגרי קורס טיס לפני מסדר כנפיים האם יהססו או יסרבו להפציץ בתי חבלנים. השניים שאמרו שיהססו או יסרבו- הודחו, ושוב- לדעתי בצדק גמור.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

פול מקרטני בכיכר האדומה

ראיתי בטלביזיה סרט דוקומנטרי של פול מקרטני מופיע לראשונה בכיכר האדומה. כמיליון איש החזיקו נרות , מזילים דמעה ושרים Let it be. פול מקרטני והמוסיקה שהקומוניסטים לא יכלו לעצור תרמו בסוף לנפילת הקומוניזם- אמר אחד הצופים.

אבל לא בגלל זה אני מספר לכם על זה, אלא בגלל משפט אחד שאמר פול וגרם לי להזיל דמעה: "אם הייתי אומר לאבא שלי לפני חמישים שנה שאעמוד יום אחד בכיכר האדומה ומיליון איש ישירו איתי-הוא היה אומר לי שאני פסיכי....כל כך הייתי רוצה שאבא יהיה פה עכשיו איתי לראות את זה....". ואני, הבנתי כל כך טוב למה הוא התכוון.

LOST IN TRANSLATION

סופיה קופולה היא בתו של פרנסיס קופולה האגדי. בסרטה החדש מראה הגברת קופולה שהתפוח לא נפל רחוק מן העץ, ושהיא בזבזה זמן ולמדה היטב. זהו סיפורו של כוכב קולנוע שנקלע לטוקיו כדי לעשות סרטון פרסומת, ואיך הבדל השעות, השפה והמנטאליות-הופכים את האדם האינטלגנטי ביותר לאידיוט גמור. בתור מי שנוסע הרבה בעולם- הזדהיתי עמוקות עם הסרט הרציני והמצחיק הזה. הגיבור נפגש שם עם אישה יפה ונשואה שצעירה ממנו בעשרים שנה. אהבתי מאוד את האיפוק והרצינות של האינטראקציה ביניהם. אני מעז לנחש שבמאי- גבר היה מכניס אותם למיטה עם צלילי כינורות, לא הגברת קופולה! תשע בסולם קורן.

פינת שִׂמְחָה

חברי שִׂמְחָה שלח לי אוסף של בדיחות שגורמות אובדן שליטה בשלפוחית. מה שכן-לא כולן מתאימות לעיתון הזה. אז הינה כמה מהמתאימות:

הסוסה:

איש אחד יושב ומביט בטלביזיה, פתאום ניגשת אשתו ודופקת לו מחבת על הראש. כשמתעורר האיש מעלפונו הוא שואל אותה: למה מה קרה?

עונה לו האשה: כשכיבסתי את המכנסיים שלך מצאתי פתק עם השם מָרי לו תומאס- אז מה-יש לך מאהבת?

עונה לה האיש: מה קרה לך, לפני שבועיים, כשהלכתי עם איציק , הימרתי על הסוסה הזאת.

קיבלה האשה את הסיפור ואפילו התנצלה.

כעבור שבוע יושב האיש ורואה טלביזיה. פתאום ניגשת אשתו ודופקת לו על הראש עם מחבת עוד יותר חזק. כשהוא מתעורר אחרי שעה הוא שואל: אז מה הסיפור הפעם?

עונה לו האשה: הסוסה צלצלה......

כדורגל ישראלי ואוהדיו

Mayoral candidates offer their vision for Toronto

Hall, Toronto mayor from 1994 to 1997, reminded the audience that she had signed a complaint against Holocaust-denying publisher Ernst Zundel and was even cross-examined at his trial by lawyer Doug Christie.

But mainly, the candidates hammered home the same message they've been presenting to Toronto voters since the campaign leading up the Nov. 10 vote started.

Tory, the former president and CEO of Rogers Cable and Rogers Media Inc., repeated his plan for keeping tax increases in line with inflation for the first year of his mandate, and then freezing taxes for the second and third year. He said he would also impose a hiring freeze of city employees, reduce the budgets of the mayor's office and of councillors, sell at least $30 million in surplus assets a year and freeze the salaries of the 400 or so staff who earn more than $100,000 a year.

The three prongs of his campaign are "managing, healing and investing," Tory said.

While Tory said he would examine "everything," including police services, he would hire 400 additional police officers immediately.

Hall, the frontrunner in the race, said the city has been "adrift" in recent years, "hampered by lack of leadership. I'm going to take City Hall and open it up again, clean it up again."

Her priorities would be safe and affordable housing for low-income families and improved public transit. As well, "arts and culture will not be marginalized."

Miller, a Toronto councillor since 1994 and former TTC commissioner, is campaigning on "a clean environment, clean government and a clean waterfront."

Miller reaffirmed his commitment to scrap plans for a fixed-link bridge to the island airport.

"A small, sleepy commuter airport is fine, but to expand it to serve 900,000 people a day is incredibly short-sighted," he said. Municipal pundits say Miller's opposition to a bridge is attracting votes mainly at the expense of Hall, who supports a fixed link.

Jakobek, a former councillor for 20 years and one-time budget chief, said raising taxes or cutting services in order to eliminate Toronto's $2 billion debt are not options.

Rather, he would sell city assets, including the parking authority and five former city hall buildings, raising what he said would be $2.6 billion and generating millions in tax revenue. He promised no road tolls or hotel taxes.

He also would cut the jobs of 21 senior city staff.

But his top priority is a zero tax increase. "After all, I did it nine times in a row [as budget chief]."

Jakobek faces an uphill battle, as his name has been linked to the ongoing MFP computer leasing scandal.

Nunziata, a former Liberal member of Parliament, billed himself a law-and-order candidate, tempered with "strong, compassionate leadership."

He too would hire 400 new police officers to return to staffing levels of a decade ago. And he would also reduce council members by 18 and cut the mayor's budget by 20 per cent.

Nunziata said there are 800 more employees today than prior to the amalgamation of Toronto with surrounding municipalities. "There's more than fat at City Hall," he said. "There's blubber."

He said he would ask the province to declare certain service, including trash and snow removal, as essential.

He drew some laughter when he said he's "prepared to do battle with the Terminator" to keep Toronto's film industry viable, referring to California Governor-elect Arnold Schwarzenegger.

The only dramatic exchange took place when Jakobek interpreted a comment by Miller as dismissive of policing.

"Julian Fantino is the best police chief we've ever had," shot back Jakobek, who said that while he was in office, the police force's budget was increased by $74 million.

Kitchen adventures: initiating my Alaskan ulu

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

No, I don't collect knives, but my enthusiasm for an Alaskan ulu while on vacation this summer prompted a fellow cruise passenger to ask me whether I did.

Although I'd never heard of an ulu knife, as soon as I entered a Ketchikan souvenir shop and saw the arced blades attached to their wooden handles, I knew I had to have one.

Often sold in matching sets, the wood-handled knives are complemented by matching bowls, their concave interiors perfectly fitted to the blades.

Mine is a hollowed-out square of Alaskan birch and American walnut. More upscale models have bone or polished stone handles on the knives. Some have their own matching knife rest — a small, slitted rectangular block.

I recognized the ulu immediately as the Inuit equivalent of a huckmesser (Yiddish for chopping knife) – the kind my grandmothers used to chop whitefish, pickerel and pike for gefilte fish.

In fact, the Inuit also used their ulus for fish, skinning salmon with deft strokes, according to a video we saw at another tourist shop.

The week before Rosh Hashanah, I opened my neatly boxed ulu, looking forward to my first old-style gefilte fish-making session. I would chop until my hand got tired, the way my late Auntie Dene, an accomplished cook, explained to me during a family history interview a couple of years ago.

First, I had to scout out the right ingredients. The kosher fish counter at my local supermarket had only chopped fish, not the fresh pieces I was looking for.

"But we just chopped it," protested the woman at the counter. "You want to chop it yourself?"

A few days later, I returned home with fish bones and fresh fish, ready to give my ulu a workout.

To begin, I sliced carrots, using a rocking motion with the knife and feeling the slight give of the wood as I chopped. Next came the onions, and finally the fish.

I realized then that I should have had the fish skinned at the store, but after a few false starts, I gained confidence separating the skin, slowly but surely teasing it from the fish.

The actual chopping was remarkably quick. Those ulus are sharp! My mother remembers her mother telling her that the more you chop, the better the texture.

Maybe I didn't chop enough, or maybe I ran into some other glitch, but the gefilte fish was disappointingly soft – not resembling at all the firm, tasty finished product I remember from my childhood.

I liked the ulu, though, and used it again to chop onions and parsley for my favourite meatball recipe, which I adapted for my vegetarian daughter. CJN food columnist Norene Gilletz supplied the gefilte fish recipes from her cookbook Second Helpings, Please! They can also be found on her Web site, www.gourmania.com.

FRANCES KRAFT'S VEGETARIAN MEATBALLS

1 lb. (1 1/3 packages) Yves' veggie ground round
1/2 cup finely chopped onion
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
2 eggs
pinch of salt
1/2 to 1 1/2 cups packaged bread crumbs
1 to 2 tbsp. margarine or oil
1 1/4 cups apricot jam
1/2 cup barbecue sauce

Place veggie ground round, onion, parsley, eggs and salt in a bowl. Add bread crumbs and combine until mixture holds together but is still a little moist. Form 1-inch balls, and brown in hot margarine or oil. Transfer to an eight-cup baking dish, or leave in the pan if it can be used in the oven.

Combine jam and barbecue sauce, and pour over meatballs. Bake at 350, stirring occasionally, for 30 minutes. Serves 8. Freezes well.

NORENE GILLETZ'S GEFILTE FISH #1

2 lbs. fish fillets (pike, carp and whitefish, reserving the head, skin and bones from the fish)
4 medium onions
4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
1 quart water
3 eggs
1/4 cup ice water
3 tbsp. matzah meal
3 carrots, sliced

Place head, skin and bones, 3 onions, 2 tsp. salt and the pepper into the quart of water. Simmer about 20 minutes. Grind the fish fillets with the remaining onion. Place in a chopping bowl, add the eggs, ice water, matzah meal and remaining seasoning. Chop mixture until very fine and thoroughly blended. Moisten hands and shape mixture into balls.

Drop balls into the boiling stock and add carrots. Cover and simmer for 1 1/2 hours. If the stock cooks down too much, add a little water. Cool the fish slightly. Remove to a bowl, strain the stock over it, and garnish with the carrot slices. Chill and serve with horseradish. Makes 12 servings.

NORENE GILLETZ' GEFILTE FISH #2

2 onions, sliced
2 carrots, sliced
1 quart water
2 tsp. sugar
2 lbs. minced fish
4 eggs
2 tbsp. bread crumbs or matzo meal
1/4 cup cold water
2 grated carrots
2 grated onions
1/2 tsp. sugar
1 tbsp. salt
pepper, to taste

Place sliced onions, carrots, water and sugar in a large pot and bring to a boil. Combine remaining ingredients and blend well in electric mixer. Moisten hands and shape fish into plum-sized balls.

Drop into boiling stock. Partially cover pot and simmer for 2 hours. Serve hot or cold. Makes 12 servings.

Baton Rouge Restaurant

One of Montreal's leading restaurant chains, Baton Rouge features ribs, steaks, burgers and pastas. Everything here tastes of quality. The beef is Stirling Silver, Canada's #1 grade. The ribs, after 12 hours' slow baking and char-broiling, literally fall off the bone; you can eat them without using your fingers. The meat is aged in-house and fish selected daily; sauces and dressings are also made fresh daily. You'll love the mahogany interior, with its deep, rich reds; Frank Sinatra and Billy Halliday seranade. Come for dinner before the theatre, and return for dessert after.

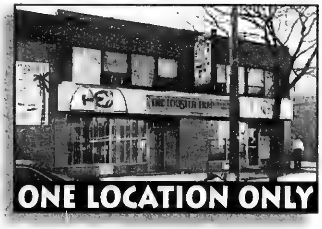
The Lobster Trap Restaurant



At 40 years, this is Toronto's longest-lasting and best-known lobster establishment. As the name implies, they feature lobsters — one to four pounds, live in tanks and fresh, prepared whatever way you like them. Also, they offer other fine seafoods and fish, such as Alaska king crab legs; for meat eaters, there are tasty items like filet mignon or chicken breast; and there is a kids' menu. The ambience is casual and friendly; most of the tables are booths, for privacy and comfort. The decor brings to mind a fisherman's cabin, with its traps, buoys and abalone shells on the walls.

Tips, techniques and a collection of beautiful breads

About Food

By
NORENE GILLETZ

I met Peter Reinhart several months ago at a culinary conference in Montreal. I was thrilled to meet him in person because I am the proud owner of a copy of his award-winning book, The Bread Baker's Apprentice, Mastering the Art of Extraordinary Bread (10 Speed Press, $56 Cdn).

This book is like having a master teacher at your side as you experience the joys of baking bread.

Reinhart teaches the classic 12 stages of building bread, with explicit instructions, accompanied by over 100 step-by-step photographs. You'll find food history, tips and techniques, plus a multi-ethnic collection of beautiful breads, ranging from New York bagels to sticky buns that outperform all the malls. If you love to bake bread, you need to have a copy of The Bread Baker's Apprentice in your kitchen!

The recipe for Cranberry-Walnut Celebration Bread makes a magnificent table presentation with its double-decker braiding, evocative of a traditional celebration challah. It makes a perfect accompaniment for a vegetarian feast. (I would suggest substituting soy milk for the buttermilk and margarine for the butter to make the bread pareve.)

There are a lot of dried cranberries and walnuts in this bread, which makes it seem difficult to incorporate them evenly, but they will all fit with patient kneading. Don't worry if some fall out during the shaping stage (just put them back into the dough) or during baking (discard burned ones). You can substitute raisins or other dried fruits for the cranberries, and pecans and other nuts for the walnuts, but the cranberry and walnut combination is a classic! Enjoy!

CRANBERRY-WALNUT CELEBRATION BREAD

3 cups unbleached bread flour
3 tbsp. granulated sugar
¼ tsp. salt
3½ tsp. instant yeast
1½ tbsp. orange or lemon extract
2 large eggs, slightly beaten
½ cup buttermilk or any kind of milk, at room temperature
2 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted
¼ to ½ cup water, at room temperature
1½ cups dried sweetened cranberries
¾ cup coarsely chopped walnuts
1 egg, whisked until frothy, for egg wash

Stir together flour, sugar, salt and yeast in a large mixing bowl (or in the bowl of an electric mixer). Add extract, eggs, buttermilk and butter. Stir (or mix on low speed with the paddle attachment), slowly adding just enough water to make a soft, pliable ball of dough.

Sprinkle flour on the counter and transfer dough to the counter. Knead (or mix on medium speed with the dough hook) for about 5 minutes, or until dough is smooth and only slightly tacky, but not sticky. It should have a soft, pliable quality, not stiff and resistant. If too stiff, knead (or mix) in small amounts of water until it softens; if it seems too sticky, sprinkle in small amounts of flour as needed. Add dried cranberries and knead (or mix) for another 2 minutes, or until they are evenly distributed. Then gently knead (or mix) in walnut pieces until evenly distributed. Lightly oil a large bowl and transfer dough to the bowl, rolling it to coat it with oil. Cover bowl with plastic wrap.

Ferment at room temperature for about 2 hours, or until double in size.

Transfer dough to the counter and divide it into 6 pieces, 3 pieces of 10 ounces each and 3 pieces of 4 ounces each. Roll out the larger pieces into strands about 9 inches long, thicker in the middle and slightly tapered towards the ends. Roll the smaller pieces into strands about 7 inches long and similarly tapered. Braid the large strands into a large braid; then braid the small strands into a small braid. Line a sheet pan with baking parchment. Place the large braid on the pan. Then centre the smaller braid on top in double-decker fashion. Brush the entire assembly with half of the egg wash and refrigerate the remaining egg wash to be used later.

Proof uncovered at room temperature for about 90 minutes, or until dough nearly doubles in size. Brush loaf a second time with remaining egg wash.

Preheat oven to 325 with the oven rack on the middle shelf.

Bake for approximately 25 minutes. Rotate the pan 180 degrees for even baking and then continue baking for another 25 to 30 minutes, or until loaf is a deep golden brown, feels very firm, and sounds hollow when thumped on the bottom. The internal temperature at the centre of the loaf should register between 185 and 190 F.

Remove bread from pan and transfer it to a cooling rack. Allow the bread to cool for at least 1 hour before slicing or serving. Makes 1 large braided loaf.

Bachelorette seeks soul mate

Fence is bold step for Sharon

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Comment

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's decision early this month to complete the security fence between Israel and the West Bank may have seemed like a formality. But it may well turn out to be the most important decision of his 30-year political career.

At any rate, the deadly suicide bombing in Haifa Saturday, Oct. 4 – which left 19 Israelis dead – showed why Sharon could not have continued procrastinating.

For months, Sharon had avoided making a final decision on the security fence. He didn't want a showdown with the Americans over the route, and he was concerned about its political implications.

Though he continues to insist that the fence is just a security barrier against Palestinian terrorists, Sharon knows that the monumental construction might have major implications for future political arrangements between Israel and the Palestinians: it could dictate future borders or, at the very least, serve as a starting point for negotiations on their demarcation.

In addition, some analysts believe, the fence might trigger an inevitable process leading to the establishment of an independent Palestinian state on the other side, consistent with the vision of the Oslo peace process – even though Sharon does not agree with Oslo's parameters.

Until he made his decision at the beginning of this month, Sharon had been caught on the horns of a dilemma: if he routed the fence along the pre-1967 border (the Green Line), he risked paving the way for a Palestinian state in all of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

That would antagonize the settler movement, cause considerable unrest in Sharon's own Likud Party and return Israel's densely populated coastal plain to dimensions so narrow that former Foreign Minister Abba Eban once labelled them "Auschwitz borders."

On the other hand, if the fence cut deeply into the West Bank to encircle cities such as Ariel, Sharon risked confrontation with the Bush administration and deductions from $9 billion in promised U.S. loan guarantees.

But the Haifa suicide bombing confirmed Sharon could no longer play for time. With no end in sight to Palestinian terrorism, public pressure on him to complete the fence has become overwhelming.

Former Labor Party leader Amram Mitzna, a former mayor of Haifa, put his finger on the public pulse.

"Sharon is not to blame for the terror," he declared at the scene of the carnage. "But he is responsible for providing security for Israel's citizens."

Sharon's creative solution was to route the fence around the large settlements but, for the time being, not to join up the parts deep in Palestinian territory with the main fence running more or less along the Green Line. The plan is to erect horseshoe-shaped fences around the settlements and then – unless the Palestinians have a radical change of heart and abandon terrorism – link them to the main fence in six months to a year.

Clearly, Sharon hopes the decision to include large Jewish settlements inside the fence will silence the right wing. In addition, the fact that the horseshoe perimeter fences will not immediately be connected to the main fence will buy him some time from the Bush administration.

According to some analysts, Sharon is banking on the American position on the fence route softening over time, the way it did on the Israel Defence Forces' reoccupation of Palestinian cities after waves of suicide bombings.

"Once, they adamantly opposed the IDF's incursion into" Palestinian-controlled territories "and now they accept the reoccupation as a fact of life," Aluf Benn wrote of the Americans in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. "In another six to eight months, when the fence issue will again come up for debate, [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush will be fighting for his political life in the election campaign and it is doubtful he'll take the time to pressure Israel."

Sharon's longer-term strategy is to use the fence to contain Palestinian terrorism until a Palestinian leadership emerges that is sincerely interested in a peace deal. He also is confident that, when the chips are down, the Americans will back him.

At home, the most vehement criticism of the fence route comes from the left.

Labor legislator Matan Vilnai says that building a fence with gaps left by the unconnected horseshoes is absurd and will leave central Israel vulnerable to terrorism.

Moreover, opposition members charge, the added length of the fence means that more soldiers will be needed to defend it, that it will take longer to build and that it will cost about four times as much.

There is also the question of Israel's image. Chemi Shalev of the Israeli daily Ma'ariv pointed out that the longer route will prove to be a huge public relations gaffe, creating an image of Israel "as annexationist, unilateralist, imprisoning thousands of Palestinians behind walls of concrete."

Worse, Shalev said, the route isolates an estimated 75,000 Palestinians in enclaves on the Israeli side of the fence, and clouds future peace talks with the Palestinians.

"This route is good – on condition that the only negotiations we hold are with ourselves," he wrote.

It's ironic, then, that by building the fence, even along the longer route, Sharon's right-wing government is carrying out the policies of Israel's left-wing: dividing the land of Israel along the lines of former prime minister Ehud Barak's proposals for territorial compromise with the Palestinians, later endorsed in the "Clinton parameters" of December 2000.

Those proposals recommended that Israel annex land belonging to about 80 per cent of settlers – in effect, drawing the border to encompass them – and removing Israeli settlements on the other side.

Some analysts went further, predicting that the fence will inevitably lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state. They paint the following scenario:

The fence succeeds as a security barrier, making attacks inside Israel difficult to carry out. The Palestinians turn against the settlers outside the fence and the Israeli soldiers defending them. Pressure mounts in Israel for the soldiers to be withdrawn and the settlements evacuated, as it did in the last years of Israel's occupation of its southern Lebanon security zone.

The international community pressures Israel to withdraw, asking what the army is doing in the West Bank now that terrorist attacks on Israel proper have ceased.

Under enormous domestic and international pressure, the IDF redeploys behind the fence, the government dismantles all the settlements on the other side and the Palestinians establish an independent state. The two sides then enter negotiations over residual Palestinian demands.

In other words, according to this scenario, Sharon's fence could bring the parties back to the parameters of the Oslo process – even though Sharon rejects that deal as a historical blunder.

Widening the war against terror

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

With the recent bombing of the Palestinian terrorist organizations' training camp near Damascus, Israel has signaled to Syria and others that it has decided to expand the war against terror to states giving asylum and assistance to terrorists and their commanders who harm Israel and its citizens.

The cabinet decided not to link its reprisal for the recent Haifa suicide bombing with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in Ramallah – this time. The camp that was hit, Ein Saheb, is eight kilometres northwest of Damascus. Its close proximity to the Syrian capital has symbolic significance, but does not require Israeli planes to fly over Damascus. A target like Ein Saheb can be accurately hit by missiles fired at a great distance. The Syrians announced that one person had been injured in the attack, but sources say there has been loss of life as well. A number of hours passed between the attack and Syria's announcement, an indication of its surprise and confusion over the strike.

The casualties were probably not high-ranking officials of the terror organizations, who live in Damascus. The camp is controlled by Ahmed Jibril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, operating in complete co-ordination with the Syrian army and whose members have been involved in attacks against Israel, including the firing of Katyusha rockets on the Galilee. All the Palestinian terror organizations, except Fatah, train at the camp, and Iranian instructors are said to appear there occasionally. Syria also hosts other training camps for Palestinian organizations and for Hezbollah, combining training for a number of organizations in one camp in order to ease logistics, which it handles.

The issue of hitting terror targets in Syria came up in Israel before the devastating suicide attack at Haifa's Maxim restaurant earlier this month.

While Hamas has recently limited its terror activities, Islamic Jihad, which took responsibility for the Maxim attack, has persisted in its efforts to send suicide bombers into Israel, including one recent attempt in Haifa that was thwarted. From the moment she crossed the border, the Maxim suicide bomber clearly had pre-arranged and close assistance from accomplices inside Israel, who transported her and her heavy explosive belt to the restaurant and then escaped.

Air force helicopters also hit Hamas weapons stores in the wake of the Haifa attack, a move defence sources explained by responding that the target was the weapons stores and not Hamas leaders.

A few weeks ago, when Hezbollah renewed its activities near Mount Hermon, Israeli air force jets flew low supersonic flights over the Assad family home in Latakia.

The evening of the Haifa bombing, it became clear that the response would not be directed against Jenin, from which the suicide bomber came. The Arab response, which made its way to the BBC, that the suicide bomber did not train at Ein Saheb, is ridiculous. The perpetrators of the World Trade Center attacks did not all train in Bin Laden's camps in Afghanistan, but this was no reason not to attack the bases in Afghanistan of Al Qaeda, the organization responsible for the attacks.

In hitting the camp in Syria, Israel took into account that all of Washington's diplomatic efforts over the past few months to convince Damascus to withdraw its support from terror organizations had come to nothing, and that economic sanctions had been of no avail. At one point, Damascus reported to the Americans that it had instructed the heads of the Palestinian organizations to leave their headquarters in the Syrian capital, but this was no more than a familiar exercise from days gone by. The leaders of the organizations, including Islamic Jihad leader Ramadan Shalah, left Damascus for a few days for Beirut, but later returned.

The failure of American efforts to discourage Syrian support for terror spurred Israel on in its decision to take action. Not only did the fact that Syria is a member of the UN Security Council not affect the decision, but it may have even encouraged it, as a means of highlighting the absurdity of the membership in the Security Council of a country that is involved in direct assistance to terror organizations.

In discussions that preceded the attack, Israel took into account that Syria, as well as other countries affected by the widening of the war against terror, would seek a means of reacting to the steps Israel would take against terrorists operating on its soil. Conventional wisdom says Syria will avoid a direct military confrontation with Israel, but that those affected by Israel's action might react indirectly against it, for example by firing Katyusha rockets on the Galilee.

Religious reform plan in Israel

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — The launch of a long-awaited reform of Israel's religious institutions has rattled a government more used to weathering outside challenges such as terrorism and economic slumps.

Two ministers from the National Religious Party stormed out of an Israeli Cabinet vote last Wednesday, saying they could quit the government over a proposal to disband the Religious Affairs Ministry and transfer some powers to the Justice Ministry, which is headed by Yosef "Tommy" Lapid of the secularist Shinui party.

With 18 of the remaining ministers approving the reform and only three opposed, the threat against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is slight. Indeed, a walkout by the hawkish NRP could free up Sharon to make future concessions in talks with the Palestinians, however unlikely that seems now.

But hints of strife in the government, especially over religious issues, are never insignificant in a Jewish state still unresolved in its identity.

Under the plan, the Religious Affairs Ministry will be dismantled by year's end and its various departments moved to other portfolios. So, for example, the rabbinical courts will go to the Justice Ministry, pre-conversion academies to the Immigration and Absorption Ministry and local religious councils to the Interior Ministry.

The fate of the Chief Rabbinate is unclear, after Sharon ruled out its inclusion in the Prime Minister's Office on constitutional grounds.

Israeli officials said the change is unlikely to affect Orthodox control over life-cycle issues such as marriages, divorces and burials.

But one Reform Jewish leader in the United States hailed the decision as a victory for the liberal streams in Israel.

"This is a momentous turning point in the struggle to achieve the creation of a pluralistic society in Israel, based on a more sensible accommodation of issues of religion and state," said Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of ARZA/World Union. "It is a goal we have been working toward for two generations."

The change is expected to be ratified by the Knesset when it returns from High Holy Day recess. If so, the NRP will consider leaving the government, party leader Efraim Eitam said. "The government made a wretched decision that disgraces the institution of the Chief Rabbinate and harms the Jewish character of the state," he said.

According to political sources, Sharon told the Cabinet before the vote: "I would never lend a hand to challenging the Chief Rabbinate as the highest religious authority in Israel."

It was Sharon's Likud party that undertook to dismantle the Religious Affairs Ministry during its previous term in government, a reform long called for by governments of various political stripes. Still, many in Israel had assumed that the initiative originated elsewhere in the Cabinet – with Lapid and Shinui.

According to media reports, Shinui pressured Sharon to move on the reform.

"Shinui is a faction that uses force, and there is no way of reaching a dialogue for partnership with it," former NRP leader Rabbi Yitzhak Levy said.

Lapid, a Holocaust survivor, reportedly was close to tears at the Cabinet session, defending himself from charges of hounding the Orthodox. He and other Shinui Cabinet ministers had threatened to quit the government after Sharon had promised the country's two chief rabbis last Tuesday night that the rabbinical courts would remain under the auspices of the Religious Affairs Ministry for at least the next two months.

However, a deal Sharon reached with Shinui does state that the Chief Rabbinate will maintain a degree of control over the rabbinical courts, to be determined by a special committee. The accord also states that authority over the Chief Rabbinate will not be transferred to Lapid's Justice Ministry, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported.

Paraplegic teen advocates total integration for all

By MIRIAM SHAVIV
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Batya Feigenbaum, 18, sits at the entrance to Meor Bais Yaakov Teachers Seminary in Jerusalem, and is greeted by her friends as they pass. A few just wave, seeing she is busy, others stop to ask about her plans for Shabbat (it is Friday afternoon); one offers to buy flowers for Feigenbaum's hosts that evening, and the two joke about affectionately.

No one pays the slightest bit of attention to the red electronic scooter Feigenbaum sits on, or the ramp leading up to the building built especially for her. Feigenbaum, a Torontonian, has been paralyzed from the waist down since birth. In recognition of her total integration into mainstream society, Feigenbaum was honoured last week by Merkaz Harmony, a pioneering educational centre in Jerusalem that runs programs to help children with special needs integrate in schools and in the wider community.

Batya Feigenbaum

"Here in Israel, we are fighting all the time so kids with special needs can go to regular school," says Merkaz Harmony founder and director Joan Shrensky. "Batya is a perfect example of why children with special needs shouldn't be isolated. They do better because they become part of society."

The centre, which is best known for its integrated kindergarten in the neighborhood of Har Nof, was celebrating its 18th anniversary. It has grown from serving one class of 16 children, to providing education for more than 400 children, and launched a variety of programs helping children all over Israel. Feigenbaum was the guest of honor at a dinner attended by 250 people, including many of the centre's parents and Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupoliansky.

Although Feigenbaum, who was born in Israel, never attended Merkaz Harmony, there are close ties between the two: Shrensky often consulted her family about her options. And Feigenbaum says that integration is a cause close to her heart.

"I'm lucky I had parents who were able to help me do everything," she says. "Not everyone has that. Many handicapped children have a lot to offer but aren't given the chance."

Her message to the Merkaz Harmony parents: "If you give everything to your children, they will be able to do whatever they want."

Feigenbaum was born in 1985, the sixth of seven children in a family who had made aliyah from the United States. During her birth, she suffered a spinal chord injury that left her a quadriplegic.

"The doctors told my parents I was going to die, and if I didn't, I was going to be a vegetable and should be put into a home," says Feigenbaum. "But my parents had faith in God and didn't give up."

Her father, Rabbi Yitzhak Feigenbaum, now principal of Toronto's Tiferet Bais Yaakov High School, and her mother Lana, now a teacher at Bais Yaakov Elementary School, immediately put Batya into therapy, which was so successful that she regained use of her upper body. She remained, however, a paraplegic and the family moved to Toronto in 1987, mostly to get better treatment for Batya.

Feigenbaum says treatment was a constant feature of her early life, but did not dominate it. Indeed, her family treated her completely normally.

"They never let me feel I was losing out," she says. "We never didn't go anywhere because of therapy, it always worked out."

Nor did she ever sense any resentment or impatience in her siblings.

"I remember on one family trip, I was in a wheelchair, and we came across some stairs," she says. "My brothers wheeled me down and made it into a joke. It was always made into fun."

Parisian Jews rally for Israel

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — French Jewish leaders are breathing a sigh of relief after police intervention allowed a pro-Israel demonstration to proceed without violent incident.

Following Saturday's deadly suicide bombing in Haifa, France's Union of Jewish Students arranged a mass rally last Tuesday outside the Palestinian Authority (PA) offices in Paris.

The student leaders said they intended to pressure the Palestinian leadership to "truly engage in the fight against terrorism" and to condemn PA President Yasser Arafat's "doublespeak."

The call for the rally, made just before Yom Kippur, drew the wholehearted support of the country's major Jewish organizations, with Roger Cukierman, president of the CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jews, slated as one of the main speakers.

Addressing more than 1,000 demonstrators at the rally, Cukierman accused Arafat of "never having lifted a finger to stop the terrorist acts of Hamas and Islamic Jihad."

But the peacefulness of the protest had been in doubt just hours earlier, when a group of 10 pro-Palestinian organizations issued a call for a simultaneous counter-demonstration at the same site.

Asking their supporters to prevent Israeli Prime Minister Ariel "Sharon's Parisian emulators" from "laying siege" to the PA building, the pro-Palestinian organizations claimed the Jewish groups "wished to participate in the hunt against a strangulated Palestinian people and its representatives."

That put the Jewish groups in a difficult position, wanting to avoid the possibility of violent clashes, but not wanting to capitulate to the provocation. In the end, the Jewish groups decided to go ahead with their demonstration while appealing for calm.

The fear of violence was not unreasonable given the attacks on Jews during demonstrations in France against the U.S.-led war in Iraq earlier this year.

During the largest of those demonstrations in March, two Jewish youths were severely beaten after a group of people, who had gathered for a rally organized by the group Joint Campaign for a Just Peace in the Middle East, attacked Jews outside the Paris offices of Hashomer Hatzair, a left-wing Zionist youth movement.

Such fears also were increased by a statement from the International League for Human Rights, which incorrectly named the extremist Jewish Defence League as one of the rally's organizers.

In fact, apart from CRIF and the Jewish students, the organizers were major Jewish organizations, including the Central Consistoire and B'nai Brith.

The threat of major violence was largely over by mid-afternoon, after the Paris police department banned the pro-Palestinian demonstration.

The police did allow for a token protest by the pro-Palestinian groups outside the Israeli Embassy, some two miles away from the Jewish demonstration. That protest took place without incident.

A number of pro-Palestinian agitators, led by the Joint Campaign's president, Olivia Zemor, tried unsuccessfully to break through police barricades to hold their protest opposite the Jewish one.

Jewish student leader Yonathan Arfi, searching for common ground with his opponents, addressed the Palestinian supporters.

"I commit myself to fighting among my own people in order that you should never be physically threatened and in order that your commitment should be respected," Arfi said. "But in the same manner, I ask you to make sure that never again should a single Jew or a friend of Israel be threatened for his convictions."

With riot police pushing the pro-Palestinian demonstrators toward the nearest metro station, Arfi's call went unanswered.

Although most Torontonians know they have a legal duty to report child abuse, almost half – 43 per cent – are not sure what situations they should report, according to a survey released last week by the Children's Aid Society of Toronto, the Catholic Children's Aid Society of Toronto and Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

The results, based on phone interviews with 400 people, will be used to help children's aid societies improve awareness so that members of the public will understand what needs to be reported, said Mary McConville, executive director of the Catholic Children's Aid Society at a press conference last week, a week into Ontario's 11th annual Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Month, marked by, among other things, a purple ribbon campaign.

"We're 95 per cent confident the [survey] responses are accurate within plus or minus five per cent," said Deborah Goodman, director of research at the Children's Aid Society (CAS).

People who even suspect a child may be in need of protection have a legal obligation to promptly report their suspicion, and the information on which it is based, to a children's aid society, said McConville. "You cannot pass this responsibility on to someone else."

When Ontario's Child and Family Services Act was amended in 2000, it was clarified to include suspected child neglect as well as suspected physical, sexual and emotional abuse.

"The community is our eyes and our ears," said Bruce Rivers, executive director of the CAS. "We rely on those calls to help us keep kids safe."

The previous day alone, he noted, children's aid societies in Toronto received 300 such calls.

On an average day, JF&CS, a registered children's aid society, receives between one and two calls, according to Karen Paikin, the agency's manager of communications. In the year that ended March 31, JF&CS received 639 reports of suspected child abuse or neglect, leading to 433 investigations and 76 opened child protection cases. As of March 3, JF&CS had 107 open child protection cases.

According to the survey, only 62 per cent would report physical harm such as punching or kicking if they knew it to be true and 30 per cent would report it based on suspicion only. Only 47 per cent would report known sexual abuse such as fondling and less than 30 per cent would report suspected sexual abuse.

"These statistics should be 100 per cent, and we are committed to working with the community to improve these results," said Rivers.

"If you're unsure, call us anyway. We're there to consult with you about your concerns," he said.

A common situation that people are unsure about reporting involves persistent, distressed crying, said McConville. She recommends erring on the side of caution.

"The vast majority of calls are screened out," she said. "Some are examined a little more thoroughly, and then some of those result in investigations. Only a small per cent result in a case being opened."

Even if a particular call doesn't warrant an investigation, the province has more than 50 interactive databases that serve as a flagging system if there are repeated calls about a particular child, said Rivers. "That could make an incredible difference in a child's life. There have been tragic situations where people did not act."

Terry Smith, accompanied by his wife Terry Ann, spoke about his family's experience after they were reported on three years ago.

At first, he said, they felt guilt, hurt and shame, "but there was no more denying that there was a problem." At the time, he said, both of them were using drugs and neglecting their parental duties.

Their four children were taken into CAS care, because someone – Smith doesn't know who – "had the wisdom to know something wasn't right and the courage to make that phone call. This was the beginning of a nine-month turning point."

With the help of CAS workers, the Smiths, who are now off drugs, have attained "structure and stability," he said. "For three years now, we've paid our rent on time… we help [our children] with their homework, go to their soccer games and eat meals together each day. We are a family. We try not to take anything for granted."

Crossing Delancey leads off new Encore season

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

A catalyst toward the fulfillment of Merle Garbe's dream of establishing her own theatre company was hearing, nearly a decade ago, that Leah Posluns Theatre had stopped doing their own shows, she says.

Garbe says she reached for the telephone after getting the news of Leah Posluns' decision to cease production, eager to negotiate a deal to use the theatre's facilities to house her then-fledgling company, Encore Entertainment.

"I felt there was a niche that wasn't being addressed in the suburban North York community, once Leah Posluns stopped doing their own shows."

Although she was unsuccessful in finding a home for her theatre company with Leah Posluns in 1994, she persevered, and in the fall of 1997, Garbe and her then-21-year-old daughter, Lea, launched Encore's first subscription series in the Studio Theatre of the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

By presenting well-executed, entertaining shows and offering reasonable ticket prices, the six-year-old company usually manages to sell most of the 170 seats in the Studio Theatre. Last season, all of the performances of Come Blow Your Horn were sold out and 95 per cent of the seats were filled for The Death Trap.

"I started out with a little voice in my head — if you build it, they will come — and they did," Garbe says.

A three-play subscription costs $57 and a single adult ticket can be purchased for $25.00. All the seats in the Studio Theatre are close to the stage and offer good sightlines.

The company operates with volunteer actors and technicians, who are teachers, lawyers, psychologists, bankers and real estate agents away from the theatre.

"The actors and crew people are all volunteers who do it for the sheer love of the theatre," Garbe says, "and they are exceptionally talented."

> 'The actors and crew people are all volunteers who do it for the sheer love of the theatre'

Encore opened its season recently, with a special concert production of Chess at Jane Mallet Theatre.

Encore's first production of this season's subscription series, at the TCA, is Crossing Delancey, playing from Oct. 23 to Nov. 2. Based on the delightful movie of the same name, starring Amy Irving, it's about a Jewish girl whose grandmother hires a matchmaker for her.

From Feb. 5 to 15, the company presents The Second Time Around, a comedy about a romantically involved widow and widower who meet with a wall of resistance and disapproval from their adult children.

Encore Entertainment's final production of the 2003/04 season, from May 6 to 16, is a musical revue conceived and written by Garbe. A Fiddler, A Phantom And Three Singing Cats, is a tribute to, and a bit of an irreverent send-up, of the shows.

Garbe has a long history of involvement with theatre, as did her late father, Jerry Simmons, the founder of the Mel Lastman Variety Players. In the 1960s, Simmons was a member of Temple Sinai's Stage 210 and, in '71, he asked her to became one of the dancers in the synagogue's production of Guys And Dolls.

After a few years of working in Stage 210 shows, Garbe took a break from theatre to raise her family. In '85, she answered an ad for chorus singers in a Scarborough Players production of How To Succeed In Business Without Really Trying. For the next 10 years, she worked with the Players and Scarborough Music Theatre, branching out into producing and directing, all the while running a home-based computer business.

"I started up Encore because I saw a niche for affordable, good quality theatre productions," Garbe says. "I also know the Jewish community are avid theatre-goers."

Show tickets can be ordered through Encore Entertainment's Web site, www.stage-door.org/encore, or by telephone, 416-733-0558.

Controversial Israeli poet to read at Festival

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The new artistic director of the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors says it's just coincidence that both Israeli authors featured in this year's festival have written works that focus on the current political situation.

Geoffrey Taylor, who replaced Greg Gatenby in July after serving as the festival's senior administrator for 12 years, says Israeli novelist Orly Castel-Bloom was an obvious choice for the festival, since the Toronto publishing house Key Porter recently released an English translation of her latest novel, Human Parts.

"Having a Canadian publisher produce an author's work makes it more accessible for us," he said.

Because J'Accuse, Aharon Shabtai's devastatingly critical book of poems about the last six years of Israeli politics, recently appeared in an American English edition, the Jerusalem poet also received an invitation to read at the festival, Taylor explained.

"Shabtai's book of poetry will be difficult for many people because of his point of view. It basically denounces the official policies of the government towards the Palestinians. But that being said, I think it's very good that the Israeli government can tolerate and allow other points of view, unlike totalitarian regimes."

Public interviews are scheduled for both authors during the festival, which runs Oct. 22 to Nov. 1. Mary-Lou Zeitoan speaks with Castel-Bloom on Sunday Oct. 26 at noon and Daniel Richler, host of the literary television show Imprint, questions Shabtai the same day at 3 p.m.

"I know that will be a controversial event but I think Richler will be able to handle it quite ably," Taylor said.

Castel-Bloom and Shabtai join a growing list of Israelis, some famous and some still relatively obscure, who have read at the 29-year-old event. The others are Yehuda Amichai, Aharon Appelfeld, Moshe Dor, Shulamith Hareven, Amos Oz, Nathan Shaham, Anton Shammas, Joshua Sobol and A.B. Yehoshua.

Taylor spoke knowingly of the Israeli literary scene and said he hoped to invite more Israelis in coming years. "We're also familiar with the Jerusalem Book Festival," he said. "The Jerusalem prize is fairly well known."

Partly as a result of a short-lived literary controversy, fans of the prolific Brazilian Jewish writer Moacyr Scliar may have the opportunity to hear him read at the festival.

Last year Montreal author Yann Martel sparked a critical uproar by declaring that he had used a plot line from Scliar's Max and the Cats in his Booker-prize-winning novel, Life of Pi. The tempest died, however, the moment Scliar congratulated Martel for his fine work and declared that no artistic trespass had occurred.

A more obvious factor behind Scliar's appearance is that Toronto-based Key Porter has just published an English translation of Scliar's The Centaur in the Garden, a title that appears on the National Yiddish Book Center's prestigious list of 100 top Jewish books of all time. Scliar reads (along with Jim Crace and Peter Robinson) in the Premiere Dance Theatre on Thursday Oct. 30, 8 p.m. Toronto novelist Cary Fagan interviews him on Oct. 31, 9 p.m.

Another Jewish author on the festival program is French novelist Henri Raczymow, whose latest work, Swan's Way, explores Proustian territory as it focuses on Charles Haas, a Jewish dandy in French high society. He reads (with Clare Boylan and Shirley Hazzard) in the Brigantine Room on Thursday Oct. 30, 8 p.m. and submits to a public interview on Oct. 29, 9 p.m.

Shabtai reads (with Robert Creeley and Glyn Maxwell) in the Premiere Dance Theatre on Saturday Oct. 24, 4 p.m. Castel-Bloom reads (with Hugo Hamilton) in the Studio Theatre on Monday Oct. 27, 8 p.m. Box office, 416-973-4000. www.readings.org.

Authors pay tribute to heroic Austrians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They were the quiet heroes, the simple men and women whose goodness shone through the dark night of the Holocaust.

Almost 60 years ago, the inhabitants of a town in Austria came to the aid of Imre Schonberger and his family when they were on the verge of starvation.

In 1944, the Schonbergers were deported from the Hungarian town of Kiskunhalas, 140 kilometres south of Budapest, and sent to Mistelbach-ander-Zaya, 45 kilometres north of Vienna.

The residents of Mistelbach were astonishingly kind to them, offering them the gift of food without asking for anything in return.

Imre Schonberger and his son, Paul (Fahidi), a Toronto Jewish day school teacher who immigrated to Canada three years ago, have co-written a book that pays tribute to these Austrian saviours.

Fortuna's Children, published in Britain by Vallentine Mitchell recently, is an unusual Holocaust story, in that it accentuates the positive rather than the negative.

The book will officially be launched at Israel's Judaica store on Sunday, Oct. 26 at 8 p.m.

Not surprisingly, the authors dedicate it to the people of Mistelbach, who did "the decent thing while too many others [did] nothing."

In an interview, Paul said that the "many acts of kindness" that initially seemed unique later became commonplace.

A teacher at the Toronto Heschel school, he believes that the people of Mistelbach helped his family because they had not bought into the racist lies of Nazi propaganda. They regarded the Schonbergers as human beings, not as vermin.

After being rounded up in Hungary, they were sent to a brick factory in Szeged, Hungary's second largest city.

From there, they were dispatched to Strasshoff, a transit camp in Austria for Hungarian Jews, and then on to an experimental horticulture centre in Mistelbach.

Fate, however, was not kind to Imre's mother's and father's family, or his grandmother.

Her four sisters, along with their husbands and children, and his three sisters and brother, were murdered in Auschwitz. And his grandmother perished in Strasshoff.

But in Mistelbach, the surviving members of the Schonberger clan were incredibly fortunate.

A woman, a total stranger who had taken pity on them, gave them a food parcel.

Imre, now 74, writes: "I was astonished and took it home, thankful that an Austrian, one of the 'enemy,' could be so warmhearted."

Many more such encounters sustained the Schonbergers, all 13 of them.

In 1947, Imre went to Palestine to fight in the 1948 War of Independence.

He immigrated to Canada in the 1950s. Subsequently, he settled in Liverpool, where his son, Paul, was born.

Now retired, Imre still lives in Liverpool.

Imre, his mother and sister paid a return visit to Mistelbach in 1961, but found no one who had helped them during the war.

He and his wife plan to return for another visit very soon, hoping they can find the people who, in the name of humanity, risked their lives to assist a group of Jewish strangers in their midst.

Synagogue baseball league crowns new champion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The day was cold but the batters hot as Pride of Israel's sluggers belted out runs by the bushel and defeated Temple Emanu-El 25-17 in the gold medal round of the Inter-Synagogue Baseball League (ISBL) playoffs.

In the silver medal consolation round, Beit Rayim beat Temple Kol Ami 26-17 while in the bronze consolation round, Holy Blossom, a rookie entry in the league, squeaked out a 15-14 win over Beth Sholom.

Perennial champions Beth Tikvah – considered the Yankees of this league – were shut out of the finals.

Pride of Israel's win capped off a flawless season that saw the North York team go 11-0 in regular season play and 5-0 in the playoff round.

The final playoff games were played on a "cold, cold morning" prior to Yom Kippur. Pride of Israel "jumped into an 18-8 lead after four innings, and cruised to the win," said Neil Grunberg, Web master for the league (www.isbl.ca) and an outfielder with the Pride. "Offensively, our bats were bristling."

In the silver medal matchup, Beth Rayim enjoyed an unanswered 11-run spree to jump into the lead, but Kol Ami chipped away to tie the score after eight. Beit Rayim's Alan Kaplan led off the ninth with a home run and that was followed by eight additional runs as Beit Rayim came out on top.

Although the league stresses camaraderie and "friendly competition," competition was the operative word as the season wound down.

"I was jumping up and down with the win," said Grunberg, 26.

The teams play a nine-inning game of "three pitch," in which batters hit pitches thrown by their own teammate.

For Pride of Israel, the win was particularly sweet, as the team made it to the final two years ago only to come out empty-handed. Last year, Shaar Shalom eliminated them early in the playoffs, but this year, the team blended hot offence and good defence to win it all.

Altogether, 12 shuls with a total of about 150 guys participate in the league, which runs on Sundays from June to October. Each team plays 11 regular season games in a round robin format and are then seeded for the playoff round.

Shuls that participate in the ISBL are: Shaar Shalom, Pride of Israel, Beit Rayim, Beth Sholom, Temple Emanu-El, Junction/Or Hadash, Temple Kol Ami, Holy Blossom, Adath Israel, Beth Tikvah, Temple Sinai, Beth David.

Home run hero

Fifteen-year-old David Goldberg was invited into the Blue Jays' dugout at the tail end of the season to meet Carlos Delgado and present him with the third ball the Blue Jays' slugger hit out of the park during a four home run evening against the Tampa Bay Devil Rays. Goldberg, who scrambled to get the ball away from three other fans, said Delgado was "pretty nice" and gave him a bat for his trouble.

נחמות קטנות, רות בונדי, הוצאת גוונים

"החיים נשארו, כפי שהיו בימים רחוקים, הליכה ביער חשוך, שורץ חיות טרף ושודדים, וכיסופים לאור דולק בקצה הדרך". כך כותבת רות בונדי, ילידת פראג, ניצולת שואה, עיתונאית, סופרת ומתרגמת. בסידרה של מאמרים והרהורי לב, בונדי מעניקה לנו חבט מפוקח על החיים. בגילוי לב אך באיפוק מעודן היא מספרת על לבטים וחיפושים אחר שפיות דעת קיומית בצל מוות וטרור. בתבונה ובהומור היא מהרהרת על נישואים, אהבה, הזדקנות, רדיפה אחר בצע ותקווה למשהו טוב יותר. היא אוהבת את מלאכת הכתיבה; "התמזל מזלי ואני בחרתי בכתיבה או שהכתיבה בחרה בי. רקדניות באלט או זמרות אופרה נאלצות לפרוש מחמת אותות הגיל, אבל אני, המאושרת, יכולה להמשיך להתערטל מאחורי פרגוד המילים."(רמת גן, ינואר 2003).

רות בונדי, זוכת פרס סוקולוב לעיתונות, פרס יצחק שדה לספרות צבאית, פרס בוכמן לחקר השואה ופרס חינוך לתרגום. שנים כתבה את הטור השביעי ב"דבר השבוע", פרסמה ארבע ביוגרפיות, ומחקרים רבים בתולדות ציביה. אני מאוד, מאוד ממליצה על נחמות קטנות.

SWEET DREAMS SOUP
(Cream of Carrot Soup with Ginger)

1 small potato, peeled & chopped
2 tblsps. margarine
1 small leek, chopped (1 to 1½ cups)
2 large carrots, finely chopped
1/2 tsp. grated fresh ginger
or 1/2 tsp. curry
1/4 tsp. thyme
1/8 tsp. nutmeg
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/2 stalk celery, chopped
2 1/2 cups milk

Boil potato in 2 cups water about 15 mins. Drain, save broth and set potato aside.

Melt margarine in soup pot on med. heat. Add leek, half the carrots, the ginger, thyme, nutmeg, salt and pepper. Sauté for 5 mins. Add celery, the remaining carrots, cooked potato, and potato broth. Add 1 cup water, and stir. Bring to a boil, then reduce heat and simmer, covered, about 20 mins. In a blender or bowl, blend or mash 2 cups of the soujp with the milk until thick and silky smooth. Return the blended soup to the soup pot, and stir.

Ladle into bowls and garnish. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

It is a basic principle in the laws of tzedakah that this crucial mitzvah cannot be fulfilled by spending in areas where one is already obligated to do so. While buying a mezuzah for a friend living in subsidized housing would qualify as tzedakah, buying the same mezuzah for one's own home is part of the mitzvah of mezuzah, not tzedakah. Tzedakah, in other words, must be part of ones' discretionary spending.

As it is obligatory for parents to provide their children with a Jewish education, it follows that tuition for a Jewish day school cannot be considered a form of tzedakah. Thus, those who can afford to do so must ignore high tuition fees in calculating their tzedakah obligations. Of course, making a donation to a Jewish school so that others' tuition may be subsidized certainly qualifies as tzedakah.

This would seem to place an enormous hardship on many families, struggling as they are to pay the basic tuition costs of our day schools. To tell them they have yet to fulfil the mitzvah of tzedakah would seem to place unfair financial strain on already depleted family budgets. Jewish legal authorities were well aware of this problem. They ruled that the mitzvah of tzedakah only begins after basic needs are taken care of. If after providing for food, clothing, housing and Jewish education there is little left over, one would actually be exempt from the key aspect of the mitzvah of tzedakah, namely the obligation to donate between one-fifth and one-tenth of one's net income to an appropriate cause. In fact, it would be forbidden to donate large amounts of money and then apply for a tuition subsidy. This would, in effect, mean asking a school to fund your tzedakah preferences.

Nonetheless, even parents on tuition subsidy must give at least token amounts to tzedakah, because the mitzvah of tzedakah has two basic components. First and foremost, we must help the needy, and if that means sacrificing some luxuries, so be it. As well, the act of giving to others – irrespective of the actual amount – inculcates within us the trait of chesed (kindness) and serves as a crucial reminder that whatever little we have is a blessing from God.

On behalf of the Town of Richmond Hill and its members of Council, I am very pleased to express my full support for the 23rd Holocaust Education Week. During this designated period, a number of awareness programs, coordinated by The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, will take place in schools, synagogues, libraries and churches across Richmond Hill. The Holocaust Centre understands that by increasing the awareness of the horrors of the past, we better ensure that they will never be repeated. This must be the legacy of the millions who died or suffered during the Holocaust. Their sacrifice must never be forgotten.

Sincerely,

William F. Bell

CITY OF MISSISSAUGA
INCORPORATED 1974
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR

On behalf of the residents and members of Council of the City of Mississauga, I am pleased to express my support for the 23rd Holocaust Education Week. This event honours the millions of men, women and children who were lost to the Holocaust and creates public awareness about the importance of racial harmony within our communities. It is important that we learn from the horrific mistakes of the past and, through educational programs such as this, ensure that this chapter of history never be repeated. I commend UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto for organizing an event that will serve to bring our communities together to help eliminate discrimination.

Sincerely,

Proclamation

Holocaust Education Week

October 30 - November 11, 2003

WHEREAS during this 23rd annual Holocaust Education Week, it is important that we honour the memory of the men, women and children who perished during the Holocaust and support the survivors who suffer the physical and emotional scars of this horrific period; and

WHEREAS: in order that these unimaginable horrors must never be repeated, it is our duty to educate our children about the lessons of the past in order to avoid a repetition of history and help them develop a deeper understanding of their responsibility for the future, and

WHEREAS. only through remembrance, education and understanding of the Holocaust can public awareness be heightened and anti-semitism, racism and prejudice eliminated

NOW THEREFORE I, Mayor Mel Lastman, on behalf of Toronto City Council and the 2.5 million people of our great City, do hereby proclaim October 30 - November 11, 2003 as "Holocaust Education Week".

Mel Lastman.

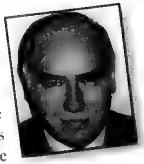
REMEMBER זכור



It is once again my great pleasure to invite you to participate in the 23rd Holocaust Education Week, the largest and highest profile initiative of The Holocaust Centre of Toronto. A wide array of outstanding programs is, as usual, being offered to afford you the opportunity to explore and examine many different aspects of the Holocaust.

While our extensive program runs just under two weeks annually in the fall, it is important to bear in mind that Holocaust education and remembrance should be ongoing. Sadly, this fact is brought home to us almost daily as we witness the increasing prevalence of religious and racial intolerance around the world, accompanied by a rise in anti-Semitic incidents and anti-Israel rhetoric and ongoing violence.

We, at The Holocaust Centre, consider it our obligation to remember those murdered during the Holocaust, and to educate the public, particularly students, in an effort to ensure that tragedies such as the Shoah do not recur. This is achieved through events such as Holocaust Education Week and the selfless efforts of our most cherished resource at the Centre, our Survivor Speakers, who teach the lessons of the Holocaust to students throughout the academic year. You will be able to hear many of these remarkable people speak during this year's event.

I would like to congratulate and thank Honey Carr and Joan Shapero and their committee for their passion and commitment in providing a superb roster of programs for Holocaust Education Week. I do hope that you will avail yourselves of the opportunity to participate in as many as possible.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2004
FOR ISRAEL AND THE JEWISH WORLD

Each year, our community takes special note of the Holocaust through the coordination of a week of education. While one can find memorials and events to commemorate the Holocaust around the world, there are few communities that invest in teaching the Holocaust in this unique way.

Reaching within and beyond the Jewish community, the depth and breadth of Holocaust Education Week is truly remarkable. In undertaking this effort, we seek to learn from the past in order to confront the dangers of the present. The continued resurgence and convergence of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism demand that we reinforce our efforts to remember, to teach, and to safeguard our community.

With best wishes for a successful Holocaust Education Week.

Sincerely,

Leslie Gales
Chair of the Board, UJA Federation

23rd Annual Holocaust Education Week

Holocaust Education Week, with its mandate to promote Holocaust education and remembrance, is a remarkable event, the largest of its kind in the world. Given today's political climate, with racism and anti-Semitism on the rise, Holocaust education takes on a more significant role. There are lessons still to be learned. Are we up to the challenge?

Over the years, the range and scope of programs have greatly expanded and this year's event, replete with diverse, thought-provoking and informative programs, is no exception. There are:

- Survivor first-hand testimonies
- Lectures by world-renowned speakers
- Films, documentaries, theatrical plays & dance recitals
- Seminars for educators
- Church programs
- Exhibits/Cultural events

We are so pleased that, for the first time, eight communities outside the GTA will be participating. The lessons learned from the Shoah will now reach a wider audience and raise public awareness in developing a deeper understanding of our responsibility for the future.

This year also marks the first time that we have received a substantial grant from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. Its recognition and financial support is very rewarding and serves to enhance our efforts.

We are honoured to be co-chairing this 23rd annual event and to be working with a wonderful group of committed volunteers. Each member believes in strengthening Holocaust education and awareness so that hatred, anti-Semitism, and racism will not be repeated. We must not only confront the past, but, as Elie Wiesel has said, "for the dead and the living, we must bear witness."

The assistance and guidance provided by Howard Driman, Chairman of The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, is greatly appreciated. This event could not take place without the complete involvement and hard work of our staff liaison, Mary Siklos, who has made our job, and that of our committee, that much easier.

We urge you to participate in as many events as possible. There has never been a more appropriate time to reexamine the tragic lessons of the Holocaust. For the most up-to-date program changes and additions, please visit our website - www.holocausteducationweek.com.

THE CHRISTIAN-JEWISH DIALOGUE OF TORONTO

2 Carlton Street
Suite 800
Toronto, Ont
M5B 1J3
(416) 596-4242

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto has again coordinated the participation of Christian churches in Greater Toronto and surrounding areas. Not only did we receive the cooperation of the churches that have participated in the past, we have added new churches to our roster. We appreciate the assistance of the clergy and educational staff, without whom it would not be possible to present these programs.

Our opening event on November 3 is very special. Entitled Sounds of Survival, it features special guest Esther Gans-Firestone of Congregation Habonim, the first female Cantor in Canada. We cordially invite you to attend this and other church sponsored programs, listed separately this year for your convenience.

Our heartfelt thanks to the participating churches and The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation for supporting us in our efforts to educate people from all walks of life.

Chair, Holocaust Remembrance Committee

REGIONAL JEWISH COMMUNITIES OF ONTARIO
הקהילות היהודיות האזוריות של אונטריו

It is indeed a privilege for the RJCO to be a part of Holocaust Education Week. While this is the first year that our member communities have been involved in hosting events, our dedication and passion are strong.

Our sense of responsibility to ensure that the lessons of the Shoah continue, and that the legacy is carried forward to our youth, is paramount to the vibrancy of Jewish life in the small communities across Ontario. This week provides an important opportunity not only to learn about the magnitude and significance of the Shoah, but also to foster a better understanding between all humanity.

We extend an invitation to all the members of our small communities to partake of these events, and help strengthen the bonds between us.

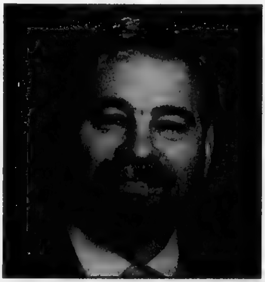
THE RESCUE OF DANISH JEWRY:
Why was Denmark Different?

In the summer of 1943, after Denmark had been occupied for several years, the Nazis decided that the time had come to round up the Jewish community. Georg Duckwitz, the German delegation's attaché for shipping affairs, leaked word of the impending action to Danish politicians who, in turn, warned the Jewish leaders barely three days before the German raid was to begin. As a result, almost the entire Danish Jewish community was saved, the vast majority being transported to Sweden. Without hesitation, the Danes took risks with no regard for the consequences. The rescue was spontaneous, decentralized and without a command structure. When the Danish Jews returned, they found that their neighbours had looked after their homes and belongings, and their jobs awaited them.

Why was Denmark different? DR. MICHAEL BERENBAUM, who oversaw the creation of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. and subsequently headed the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, will explore this question. Dr. Berenbaum is a Professor of Holocaust Studies and the author and editor of over twelve books. He has been the historical consultant for several award-winning Holocaust documentaries.

Dr. Berenbaum will reprise his lecture given recently at the Royal Copenhagen Library in the presence of Queen Margrethe II of Denmark. His keynote address marked the official Danish commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the rescue of Danish Jews during the Holocaust.



Dr. Michael Berenbaum

This evening will also mark the opening of a special exhibit, *Denmark 1943, that has been loaned to The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation for the duration of Holocaust Education Week by the Royal Danish Embassy in Washington, D.C.

This program is generously co-sponsored by the Abraham and Ida Moncik Memorial Fund for Holocaust Education.

The exhibit can be viewed at Temple Sinai from October 31-November 11.

“NICKY'S CHILDREN”

This documentary describes the story of 669 children who were saved by Nicholas Winton, a young British stockbroker. Fifty years after his extraordinary exploit, the story was uncovered when his wife discovered albums and files in their attic. These children learned, at last, how they came to be saved. Winton, now 94 years old, was knighted this year by Queen Elizabeth II for his humanitarian achievements. Guest speaker following the screening will be JOE SCHLESINGER O.C., celebrated CBC correspondent and one of the children saved by Sir Nicholas. Mr. Schlesinger has reported on many of the major events of the 20th century, and has received numerous awards for his journalistic excellence.

This program is generously co-sponsored by the Rash family, in loving memory of Harry Rash and in honour of his great-grandson Hayden Gray Steinberg.

"JEWISH RESISTANCE DURING THE SHOAH"

PROFESSOR STEVEN T. KATZ will explore the complex and often misunderstood issue of Jewish resistance during the Holocaust. He will examine the historical, political and existential situation in which European Jews found themselves between 1933 and 1945 and will describe the actual, considerable and quite remarkable nature of Jewish resistance. Professor Katz is Director of the Elie Wiesel Center for Judaic Studies at Boston University. He received his Ph.D. from Cambridge University in England, and has published extensively and lectured internationally.

This program is generously co-sponsored by The Sharon Diamond and Walt Family Fund at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, in loving memory of Sharon B. Diamond and Isidore J. Walt.

Beth Tzedec Congregation 416-781-3514 ext. 34
1700 Bathurst Street, Toronto

DESIGNING SACRED SPACE:

Memorializing the Holocaust

Daniel Libeskind

DANIEL LIBESKIND, born in Poland to Holocaust survivors, is the internationally renowned and influential architect, recipient of many awards, and acclaimed for his design of such buildings as the Jewish Museum in Berlin and the Felix Nussbaum Museum in Osnabruck, Germany.

Mr. Libeskind will address the issues he considers, his aims and objectives, and the particular challenges he faces when designing buildings to memorialize the Holocaust.

This program will commemorate the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, when, on November 9-10, 1938, a massive, coordinated attack was carried out against Jews throughout Germany and Austria. Hundreds were killed or injured, synagogues burned, businesses destroyed, cemeteries and schools vandalized and thousands of Jews arrested and sent to concentration camps.

This program is generously co-sponsored by Nicholas M. and Hedy J. Munk and The Firestone Family Annual Lecture, and by the Goethe Institut.

"In Berlin...fire engines stood by to protect the nearby main post office while the Oranienburgstrasse synagogue burned." Photo – Kristallnacht: the Nazi night of terror by Anthony Read and David Fisher. Published by Random House.

"HOW TO ENSURE THAT THE HOLOCAUST WILL NEVER BE FORGOTTEN"

IRVING ROTH, a native of Czechoslovakia and Hungary, is a survivor of Auschwitz and Buchenwald. In addition to being the Director of the Holocaust Resource Centre of Manhasset, New York, he is an award-winning historian, lecturer and writer on the Holocaust. In 1998, he developed the "Adopt a Survivor" program, instituted throughout the U. S. in public and parochial high schools and universities, that attempts to capture and preserve the survivor's experience. Through individual interaction between survivors and students, the student absorbs the survivor's life, spirit and soul and is able to retell the survivor's story accurately for generations beyond the survivor's life. Mr. Roth will share his moving story of survival as well as discuss the innovative educational activities he has initiated. Recommended for educators teaching about the Holocaust.

This program is generously co-sponsored by Gayle, Alf, Ava, Lara and Shane Kwinter, in loving memory of Mila and Zalman Kwinter.

"WE HAVE TALKED ENOUGH"

Since the end of the Holocaust, billions of dollars have been invested in literature, memorials and programs to remember the atrocities committed against the Jewish people by the Nazis. Similarly, much discussion internationally has ensued about the terrible genocide responsible for the deaths and murders of over a million Rwandans in 1994. Ve'ahavta and members of the local Rwandan community will join together in a discussion dealing with what can be done to ensure that genocides never occur again. Guest panelists include AVRUM ROSENSWEIG, Director, Ve'ahavta and LEO KABALISA, teacher with the York Region District School Board and a member of the Board for Hope for Rwanda's Children Fund. Co-sponsored by the Young Adult Division of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"THE PIANIST"

Roman Polanski's Academy Award-winning film is based on the memoirs of the talented pianist Wladyslaw Szpilman, a Polish Jew, who miraculously survived World War II. The story is told through Szpilman's eyes, and thus carries as much confusion and fear as disgust and torment. His struggle to survive, with some help from non-Jews, is seen through long, silent, languid stretches filled with the imagined piano music that inspires him to live.

"THE GESHER PROJECT"

Gesher, the Hebrew word for bridge, is a collection of 17 mixed-media paintings and 10 smaller pieces created in Vancouver by 19 survivors, child survivors and 2nd Generation to bridge the topic of the Shoah between generations. The aim is to stimulate dialogue through these poignant, emotional, and haunting pieces.

Opening Reception – Sunday, November 16th, 2:00-4:00pm in the Koffler Centre Loggia. Admission is free.

"VOYAGE OF THE DAMNED"

As part of a Nazi propaganda effort to show that Jews are the most unwanted race on earth, a ship is loaded with Jewish refugees and sent to Havana in 1939. Stars Faye Dunaway, Max Von Sydow, Orson Welles, Malcolm McDowell and Jose Ferrer.

Monday, November 3 – 4:00 pm

"CHILDREN OF TEREZIN"

The spirit of hope is embodied by a group of children in a Jewish ghetto in WWII as they publish a magazine despite horrible conditions.

Monday, November 3 – 5:00 pm

"THE FEAR OF FELIX NUSSBAUM"

This program pieces together the quest for the forgotten and hidden art of Felix Nussbaum, a German Jewish artist who perished in the Holocaust. What is remarkable about the story is that the campaign to resurrect Nussbaum's works and build a museum to house them is spearheaded by the mayor of Osnabruck, Nussbaum's home town - the same town that ostracized him nearly sixty years ago and watched the Nazis transport Jews to their graves. (Closed captioned.)

Wednesday, November 5 – 1:00 am

"TRAIN OF LIFE"

A Jewish community, warned of the impending arrival of the Nazis, builds a fake deportation train to escape Russia and head towards safety in Palestine.

THE HOLOCAUST CENTRE OF TORONTO,

UJA FEDERATION

For almost two decades, the Centre has been committed to preserving the memory of the victims of Nazi persecution while also serving as a Centre for education.

Visitors of all ages can view audio-visual presentations portraying European Jewry before, during and after World War II; witness first-hand the horror of the Holocaust through memorabilia and displays; and experience the reflective Hall of Memories, where families pay tribute to their loved ones.

School groups have the opportunity to hear the personal testimony of Holocaust survivor speakers whose shining example of courage and dignity serves as a role model for a new generation. A newly-inaugurated interactive exhibit, "We Who Survived..." features contemporary portraits of these survivors and autographical sketches.

As well, The Anita Ekstein Holocaust Resource Library, with its extensive Holocaust-related collection, serves all segments of the community.

The Centre is located in the Lipa Green Building at 4600 Bathurst Street in Toronto. For more information, call 416-635-2883 ext. 153 or visit www.jewishtoronto.net

Malaysian PM condemned

CJN News Services

PUTRAJAYA, Malaysia — Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham condemned as "totally unacceptable" remarks made last week by Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad at the Organization of the Islamic Conference summit, in which he said, "Jews rule the world by proxy" and "get others to fight and die for them."

In his opening address to the 57-nation summit in Putrajaya, Malaysia, Mahathir called on the world's 1.3 billion Muslims "to unite against a few million Jews who rule the world by controlling the world's major powers," and he charged that Jews had "invented socialism, communism, human rights and democracy so that persecuting them would appear to be wrong, so that they can enjoy equal rights with others."

Mahathir, 77, who is stepping down Oct. 31 after 22 years in office, said Muslims should employ "new tactics to fight the enemy," including leveraging the political, economic and demographic forces at the disposal of Muslim nations to "defeat Israel."

Anti-Semitic diatribe

Graham joined the United States, Australia and a number of European nations in condemning the remarks. He said he discussed the speech with other ministers gathered in Bangkok for an Asia-Pacific economic conference and has instructed his officials in Ottawa to call in Malaysia's high commissioner to Canada to register a formal protest.

"What is important is that we make it clear to our own citizens that we totally reject both the premise and spirit of where this is coming from," Graham told reporters by phone from Bangkok.

Intifadah hijacked envoy's agenda

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Bell

Michael Bell's "agenda" as Canada's ambassador to Israel was basically hijacked by the violence and terrorism of the Palestinian uprising.

Bell, who recently returned to Canada after spending nearly four years in Tel Aviv, sought to develop "normal" relations with Israel.

Having concluded that Israel and the Palestinians had embarked on a path of reconciliation after the signing of the 1993 Oslo accords, he set his sights on expanding Canada's free trade agreement with Israel and upgrading cultural exchanges.

Bell, who took up his post in the fall of 1999 shortly after Yom Kippur, said he was keenly aware that terrorism could derail Israel's talks with the Palestinians.

Nevertheless, he hoped to reconfigure Canada's relationship with Israel so that it would not be completely overshadowed by one compelling issue – the perennial question of war and peace in the Middle East.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Store Software Deal

TORONTO — Retalix, an Israeli supplier of retail marketing software, said earlier this month that Global Payment, a leading provider of retail data processing services, will be using its software to bill gasoline buyers in Canada. In the West, Retalix software is being rolled out in gas stations and convenience stores of Calgary-based Husky Energy. In Atlantic Canada, Irving Oil has said it will also use Retalix technology in its next generation payment systems.

ISRAEL

Israelis Against Plan

JERUSALEM — Most Israelis are opposed to an unofficial peace plan drafted by left-wing Israelis, led by Meretz MK Yossi Beilin, and Palestinian figures, a poll of 500 Israelis published last week in Yediot Achronot found. Some 59 per cent don't support the proposal, and 69 per cent said such talks should not be held without government approval. Thirty per cent backed the plan, which calls for the division of Jerusalem. Government officials have derided the plan as misguided and undemocratic.

Nuke Report Denied

JERUSALEM — Israel's former deputy defence minister Ephraim Sneh last week dismissed recent reports in the Los Angeles Times that Israel has upgraded its submarines to hold nuclear weapons, calling the reports "simply impossible." Ted Hooton of Jane's Naval Weapons Systems, a magazine that covers the defence industry, agreed, saying Israel's Harpoon subs can't accommodate nuclear weapons.

Café Hillel Reopens

JERUSALEM — A café rocked by a Sept. 9 suicide bombing that killed seven people re-opened Oct. 9. New Jersey-born Jerusalemite Martin Lee paid for all customers' drinks at Café Hillel, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Lulavs, Etrogs Seized

JERUSALEM — Customs agents at Ben-Gurion Airport last week confiscated two of the four ritual items used on Sukkot from tourists visiting for the holiday, Ha'aretz reported. Agriculture Ministry regulations prohibit the import of etrogim and lulavim, which are used along with willow and myrtle-tree branches. The Tourism Ministry said it would replace any confiscated kits.

WORLD

Russian Attacks

MOSCOW — A Jewish man, Robert Aminashvili, 25, died last week of head injuries received on the night of Yom Kippur, when he was severely beaten on a Moscow street after leaving a downtown yeshiva. Police are investigating. Also last week, an Israeli yeshiva student suffered severe head injuries when he was beaten on a street in the central Russian city of Perm. The student, whose name was not released, was in hospital last week in serious but stable condition.

Swiss Banks Deal

ZURICH — Swiss banks agreed to give some access to dormant accounts involved in a settlement with Holocaust victims. One of the lawyers who represented survivors in the $1.25 billion (US) settlement said the deal would allow more money from the fund to be released to survivors and their families, the New York Times said. The deal comes shortly after the investigator involved in overseeing the fund filed a report critical of the banks for limiting access to documents needed to make payouts. But a spokesperson for the banks said the deal came before the report was filed.

Neil Postman Dies

NEW YORK — Social critic and media scholar Neil Postman died Oct. 5 of lung cancer at age 72. The New York University professor wrote 20 books, but he was perhaps best known for 1982's The Disappearance of Childhood, which argued that television blurs the line between childhood and adulthood, and 1984's Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public Discourse in the Age of Show Business, which argued that TV trivializes public discussion.

Jews Criticized

SAO PAULO — Nobel laureate José Saramago said last week the Jewish people no longer deserve "sympathy for the suffering [they] went through during the Holocaust." Saramago, who won the 1998 Nobel Prize in literature, said "living under the shadows of the Holocaust and willing to be forgiven for anything they do on behalf of what they have suffered seems abusive to me. They didn't learn anything from the suffering of their parents and grandparents." A regular critic of Israel, the Portuguese novelist also compared Ramallah to Auschwitz.

Pro-Palestinian Protester Acquitted

TORONTO — A judge has dismissed the case against a pro-Palestinian demonstrator charged with assaulting a Jewish heart surgeon, suggesting the doctor's description of his attacker was unreliable.

Judge David Fairgrieve issued his ruling Oct. 10, right after closing arguments in the two-day trial before him in the Ontario Court of Justice, the Toronto Star reported.

Murad Ebeid, 39, a safety marshal at pro-Palestinian protests, pleaded not guilty to a charge of assault causing bodily harm stemming from an incident in March 2002.

Dr. Bernard Goldman, 67, testified he was assaulted outside Chapters bookstore on Bloor Street near Avenue Road after calling out "stop the suicide bombing" to a group of pro-Palestinian protesters. After viewing police video of the protest that did not show the alleged assault, Goldman identified Ebeid as the man who grabbed him and shoved him against a car, fracturing his shoulder.

Ebeid told the court he had no contact with Goldman and never left his position in the demonstration line.

A police officer testified that hours after the incident, Goldman told police his attacker weighed 150 pounds and had a beard. But in a later written statement, he said the man was 6 feet, 200 pounds, stocky and with a moustache, a description roughly matching Ebeid's.

Noting that "honest witnesses make mistakes," Fairgrieve said, "The question is, how reliable is the evidence?" He added, "It's obvious Mr. Ebeid, does not, and did not, have a beard."

Fairgrieve also criticized police for losing two notepads with notes on the case, and he wondered why police didn't ask Goldman about the discrepancies in his descriptions.

Student sukkah vandalized at York University

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish students at York University – a campus plagued in the past year by heightened Mideast-related tensions – were disheartened last week following the destruction of their on-campus sukkah.

As of last week, the incident was being treated as a crime of mischief by police, but Det. James Hogan of the Toronto Police Service's Hate Crimes Unit stressed that such occurences are "investigated just as thoroughly [as obvious hate crimes], whether we conclude they're hate crimes or not."

Although there was no anti-Semitic message in the form of graffiti or literature, Bernie Farber, executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, told The CJN there was no doubt in his mind that the vandalism was a hate crime.

A sukkah has no meaning other than its religious connotation, he said. "It would have taken three or four people probably 30 minutes to an hour to destroy it." The 12-foot by 12-foot sukkah, with tarp walls supported by copper piping, was built with extra care this year to prevent damage from wind, as had happened in the past, he noted.

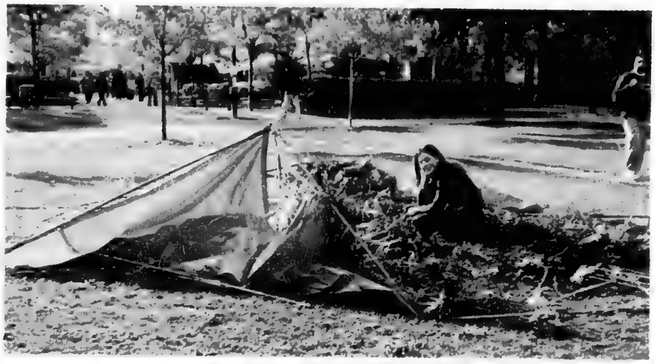
"This is clearly a crime," said Hogan, adding that an identifiable community was the victim. "It's entirely possible that it was a hate crime, but we don't have any [conclusive] evidence."

Police from 31 division and York University security conducted a "very thorough" investigation, he added. There were no suspects, and the investigation was still open as of late last week.

The sukkah was erected Thursday, Oct. 9, in Vanier Field, an open area between the student centre and Vanier College, and near student pubs, which are heavily populated on Thursdays (pub night).

The following morning, a student discovered minor vandalism, which was repaired, and two days later, on Sunday night, Talia Klein, director of Hillel at York, discovered the sukkah had been destroyed.

"It was uprooted from the ground," said Hillel at York president Jordie Saperia. "It was impossible for the wind to have blown it down. You would have had to physically take it apart."



Student sukkah was destroyed at York University.

With mid-terms approaching, there was no time to put the sukkah back up, he said. "It's very unfortunate and very disappointing."

Several programs that had been scheduled to run in the sukkah were cancelled, and Klein noted that observant students, some of whom

A wider view of advocacy

From the editor's desk

Ronen Gil-Or is a large man who walks with a slight stoop. When he speaks, you listen. His opinions are informed and he speaks with the authority that comes from years of diplomatic and other experience. As well, he speaks with an endearing quasi-musical lilt that makes his basso-profondo voice almost ariatic to the listener.

I listened a great deal to Gil-Or when we met early one morning two weeks ago to discuss the "situation" in Israel.

Gil-Or is the deputy head of mission at the Embassy of Israel in Ottawa. He has been in the post just over a year and, along with his family, is still discovering the many seasonal pleasures and climatic nuances of life in Canada.

But it was life in Israel that occupied our minds and stirred our discussion that morning.

The international community was reacting with its predictable condemnation over Israel's strike at the Islamic Jihad training camp in Syria. The spotlight at the UN was once again shining on Israel like the proverbial bare-bulb shining from the ceiling on a criminal suspect in a police interrogation cell. The media were focused on the Security Council "debate."

The subject was a logical jumping-off point, for me, to ask about Israel's security needs. Gil-Or answered my questions fully, without hesitation, but politely reminded me that security for Israel encompasses far more than the prevention of terrorism and military incursions from other hostile forces.

Without diminishing the significance of the need for security for Israelis in the sheer physical sense, the term also includes economic, social and cultural well-being, which, Gil-Or said, the government of Israel is also determined to try to provide its people.

Thus, for example, promoting trade and investment policies in the offices of Canadian decision-makers is as important for Israel as promoting certain foreign affairs policies.

It follows, therefore, that an expanded notion of security means a concomitantly expanded notion of advocacy on Israel's behalf.

It was a not-too-subtle proposition that Gil-Or underscored in a number of ways.

Despite the recent steep reduction in the number of Israeli diplomatic missions around the world necessitated by severe budgetary cuts imposed on Israel's Foreign Ministry, Israel still maintains three missions in Canada: the embassy in Ottawa and consulates in Montreal and Toronto.

Only two other countries have an equal or greater diplomatic Israeli presence: China has three missions, the United States has 10.

The three missions in Canada are a reflection of the high priority that Israel attaches to its relations with the people of Canada, the foundation of which is the shared belief in the sanctity of democratic values – the rule of law and freedom.

Into that foundation, Israel hopes to plant strongly burgeoning, security-enhancing roots of more bilateral trade, investment and industrial and cultural relations. In this regard, "bilateral" does not only refer to relations between governments, but also to relations between companies and individuals.

Gil-Or brought my attention to a number of current and proposed bilateral economic projects in which the embassy staff was engaged with its Canadian counterparts: _

- Agricultural research and development. A seminar will be held in Ottawa next month with officials from Agriculture Canada and Israel's Agriculture Research Office to inaugurate broader scientific co-operation between the two countries in agriculture research.
- Bio, nano and environmental technologies. The embassy is facilitating research and development collaboration with interested parties, including provincial governments that have expressed an interest in Israeli technology. It also supports the important work of the Canada Israel Industrial Research and Development Fund, headed by Henri Rothschild in Ottawa.
- Safety and security. The embassy has made initial contacts with individuals, companies and governments that it deems might benefit from Israel's advanced technologies in the area of security and transportation safety products.
- Information and communication technology. The embassy hopes to capitalize on the interest being shown by various levels of Canadian governments in Israel's communication-related industries.
- Space exploration. A letter of intent, setting out areas of bilateral co-operation in research and development, was signed after a meeting this summer between the Canadian and Israeli national space agencies.

These are only a few of the economic areas in which embassy staff are finding ties with Canadians. There are more ongoing projects and more projects that will be developed. By the end of our meeting, Gil-Or had effectively made the point about expanding and re-thinking Israel's security, as well as the related point about Israel advocacy.

Thus, in addition to the way they already support Israel, Canadian advocates should also think in terms of supporting policies that enhance access in Canada to Israeli technologies, products, goods and services; that promote joint investment ventures among Canadian and Israeli firms; that create more opportunities for co-operation in joint research and development; and that encourage cultural, literary and artistic exchanges between the two peoples.

This shift in approach should not be too hard to achieve. —MBD

Israelis, Palestinians must enjoy same rights: activist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel will not enjoy peace and security unless the Palestinians enjoy the same rights, says an Israeli peace activist.

Oren Medicks, a member of Gush Shalom, led by publisher Uri Avneri, called on Diaspora Jews to impart this important message to Israel.

Jewish communities outside Israel should support the Jewish state. But Jews should encourage Israel to settle its conflict with the Palestinians on the basis of a two state solution, the return of Jewish settlers in the territories to Israel, Israel's withdrawal to the pre-1967 border and a mutually satisfactory resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem that preserves Israel's demographic status as a Jewish state, he said.

Comparing Israel to a reckless adolescent, he said, "Israel is the child of the Jewish people, and it's unwise to let this child go astray."

In an interview at the start of a Canada-wide tour, Medicks – an Israeli army veteran who fought in the Yom Kippur War and served in the territories during the first intifadah – said, "If you want true peace, you have to recognize the Palestinians as equals."

Israel and the Palestinians are currently locked in a deadly embrace, but peace is possible if both sides compromise, he said.

Medicks, a 49-year-old video editor from the Tel Aviv suburb of Ranana who runs Gush Shalom's Web site, said that the Palestinians will continue to resist Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

In a reference to suicide bombings, he denounced "some of these forms of resistance as ugly."

But Medicks warned that Israel could become "an apartheid state" and expose itself to "a dangerous future" if it does not end the occupation.

Israel shows no willingness to bring the occupation to a close, he said. Since the 1993 Oslo accords, the Jewish population in the territories has doubled.

Medicks charged that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has no interest in giving the Palestinians a viable, contiguous state, one of the prerequisites of peace.

"He wants to push the Palestinians into a bantustan, into fragmented territorial enclaves."

Medicks claimed that Sharon's predecessor, Ehud Barak, followed the same policy when he negotiated with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat at Camp David in the summer of 2000. "Their ideas are identical."

Israel has no alternative but to negotiate with Arafat, the only Palestinian leader with the moral and political authority to make peace with Israel.

"I don't think Arafat loves the idea of Israel, but he recognizes he can't annihilate Israel by force."

In his judgment, Arafat is willing to settle for 22 per cent of mandatory Palestine, the land encompassing the West Bank and Gaza.

Medicks acknowledged that Arafat was in breach of the Oslo accords by resorting to violence to resist Israel's occupation. But he said that Israel has used violence as well.

A way out of the impasse is a mutual ceasefire, he suggested.

In his view, Arafat will deal with terrorism once a Palestinian state has been established. Until then, he added, Arafat has no real incentive to crack down on groups such as Hamas.

Medicks said that Gush Shalom opposes the demolition and uprooting of Palestinian homes and olive groves for military purposes, as well as the targeted killings of Palestinian leaders.

Weizmann Society to honour former head

By LEILA SPEISMAN

Sharon Zuckerman, national president of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science from 1995 to 2000, will be honoured at the society's national annual meeting at the Sutton Place Hotel, Oct. 26 at 10 a.m.

Lunch will follow.

A spokesperson said Zuckerman has been active in the Canadian Society almost since its inception. She is a major donor to the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot and visits there frequently.

Guest speaker at the meeting will be Dr. John Trachtenberg, who was himself honoured by the society at a gala last June. He is a professor in the department of surgery and a professor of medical imaging at the University of Toronto and is director of the Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Trachtenberg is currently conducting clinical trials at Princess Margaret of Tookad, a drug to fight prostate cancer that was developed at the Weizmann Institute by Avigdor Scherz and Yoram Salomon. Results so far have been very promising, the society spokesperson said, and trials will begin shortly to see if it can help other kinds of cancers, such as breast cancer.

Trachtenberg's topic will be "Tookad – From Dream to Reality."

For more information or for reservations, call Sheri Federman, 416-733-9220.

CORRECTION

Mayoral candidate David Miller was misquoted in the story "Toronto mayoral hopefuls square off in debate" (CJN, Oct. 16). In voicing his opposition to a fixed-link bridge to the Toronto Island Airport, Miller was quoted as saying that "a small, sleepy commuter airport is fine, but to expand it to serve 900,000 people a day is incredibly shortsighted." The correct figure should have been 900,000 people a year. The CJN regrets the error.

Jewish Book Fair offers something for everyone

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The 27th annual Jewish Book Fair, presented by The Koffler Centre of the Arts, is set to take place Nov. 8 to 16 at Bathurst Jewish Centre's Leah Posluns Theatre.

Helen Redner, the fair's director for 23 years, says visitors – they expect about 10,000 this year – can look forward to attending a wide range of programs and looking at thousands of books that cover the gamut of Jewish cultural life.

A.B. Yehoshua

Redner, along with her board of about 27 members, has spent the year since the last fair reading catalogues and reviews, and planning this year's event.

It is the aim of any Jewish book fair to "reinforce Jewish identity, and get Jewish books into Jewish homes," she says.

Setting up the fair is an enormous job, "just like opening up a book store. Volunteers spend hours unpacking books, laying them out, handing out brochures and taking cash."

Among the highlights of the fair is a special advance program, Nov 1, 8 p.m., at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., featuring Robert Meeropol. He is the son of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, who were executed by the United States in 1953 for conspiracy to commit espionage. Meeropol will speak on his newest book, An Execution in the Family: One Son's Journey.

At the opening night presentation moderated by Harvey Atkin, to be held Nov. 8 at 8 p.m., guests such as Marilyn Lightstone, Morley Torgov, Paul Soles and Sarah Swartz will read from Beautiful as the Moon, Radiant as the Stars: Jewish Women in Yiddish Stories, an anthology of stories newly translated into English. Also on the program will be singer Honey Novick.

On Nov. 9, 8 p.m., Gabriel Schoenfeld, senior editor of Commentary and author of the forthcoming book The Return of Anti-Semitism, will explore how and why a murderous anti-Semitic rage has once again come into being.

Israeli novelist A.B. Yehoshua, author of Mr. Mani, Open Hart, Journey to the End of the Millennium and his latest book, The Liberated Bride, will speak on "The Israeli Writer: Between Mythology and History," Nov. 10 at 8 p.m.

A number of programs are planned for children: On Nov. 9, 11 a.m., Sharon Abron Drache will read from her new book, The Magic Pot; Nov. 11, 1:30 p.m., and Nov. 13, 10:30 a.m., Kathy Kacer, author of The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, Clara's War and her latest, The Night Spies, will speak about the importance of understanding and remembering the Holocaust; and Aubrey Davis, author of Bone Button Borscht and the Enormous Potato, will read from his new book, Bagels from Benny, on Nov. 9 at 2 p.m.

Also scheduled is Anita Diamant, author of The Red Tent and Pitching My Tent, who will talk on Nov. 13, 8 p.m., about "Marriage, Motherhood, Friendship and Other Leaps of Faith."

CANCER SUPPORT: Edda Laxer (right), president of Beth Tikvah Synagogue Sisterhood, presents Marsha Urowitz, president of L'Chaim Cancer Research Support Group for Jewish Women, with a cheque for the funds from their recent fashion show. For more information about L'Chaim, call 416-633-0409.

23RD ANNUAL HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

Opening Night

Thursday, October 30 – 7:30 pm
Temple Sinai
210 Wilson Avenue, Toronto

THE RESCUE OF DANISH JEWRY:
Why was Denmark Different?

In the summer of 1943, after Denmark had been occupied for several years, the Nazis decided to round up the Jewish community. Georg Duckwitz, a German delegation attaché, leaked word of the impending action to Danish politicians, who, in turn, warned the Jewish leaders barely three days before the German raid. As a result, almost the entire Danish Jewish community was saved, the vast majority being transported to Sweden. Without hesitation, the Danes took risks without regard for the consequences. When the Danish Jews returned, they found that their neighbours had cared for their homes and belongings, as well as their jobs. Why was Denmark different?

Join us to initiate our community's internationally recognized Holocaust Education Week and to hear this remarkable story of selfless courage and compassion. Dr. Michael Berenbaum, who oversaw the creation of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., will reprise his lecture given recently at the Royal Copenhagen Library in the presence of Queen Margrethe II of Denmark, marking the official Danish commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the rescue of Danish Jews during the Holocaust.

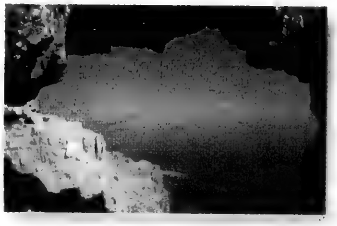
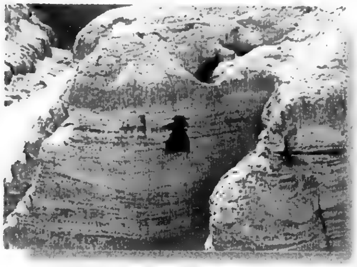
Israel: The Beauty Deep Inside

For those who crave caves, with all their history, mystery and the pure joy of exploration, few countries can top Israel. Caves have housed holy men, heroic warriors and members of ostracized sects. But you don't have to be an archaeologist or a geologist to appreciate their significance. In Israel, cave-hopping can provide active family fun.



THE SOREQ CAVE - On the western ridge of the Judean hills, this small cave - 60 metres wide by 82 metres long - features dozens of stalactites, formations formed over thousands of centuries that look like icicles. In fact, scientists, who use them to study climate changes, tell us that many stalactites are 300,000 years old. The Soreq Cave, part of a government nature reserve, is open year-round, with a slide show, a guided tour and a reasonable admission fee



THE QUMRAN CAVES - In 1947, in these caves, south-east of Jerusalem, a young Bedouin shepherd happened upon one of the world's most remarkable archaeological finds - the Dead Sea Scrolls. From 1951-1956, hundreds of biblical manuscripts and thousands of historical fragments were unearthed in 11 caves. From these extraordinary discoveries, historians shed light on the life of Essenes sect members who lived in the area.The scrolls are currently housed at the Israel Museum, but the Qumran caves and the accompanying ruins are still quite a spectacular sight, under the protection of Israel's Parks Authority.

THE SEA CAVES - As if the scenery in Israel's northernmost coastal city of Rosh Hanikra isn't spectacular enough, try descending by cable car from the city's heights to gaze at 200 metres of Mediterranean Sea caves below. Millions of waves carved caverns and grottoes from the limestone cliffs surrounding Rosh Hanikra. At the bottom of one cliff, there's a train tunnel along a route that once ran from Cairo to Beirut, through Israel.

THE BELL CAVE - Named for its bell shape, this popular tourist attraction in Beit Guvrin, about 60 kilometres south of Jerusalem is actually very roomy, with its 20 metre-high ceiling. About 800 caves resembling bells are among a total of 2000 in the region. Many of them, which served as quarries for building materials in ancient days, are linked by underground passageways.

Repugnant

Scapegoating the Jewish people is a ploy plucked straight from the pages of any medieval manual on the inter-relationship between the successful oppression of one's own people and the demonization of the Jews. Many rulers through the ages have used the ploy. All of them have had malevolent hearts.

Thus, it came with little surprise that the outgoing prime minister of Malaysia, Mahathir Mohamad, last week "read" from the manual in his farewell remarks to a summit his country hosted of the 57-member state Organization of Islamic Conference.

"Jews rule the world by proxy… and get others to fight and die for them," Mahathir offered. Jews "invented socialism, communism, human rights and democracy so that persecuting them would appear to be wrong, so that they can enjoy equal rights with others."

Mahathir was expounding on the state of the Muslim world and was, ostensibly, providing a pep talk of sorts to his fellow Muslims to use their demographic critical mass in the realm of politics and economics to "achieve a final victory" over Israel, if not over the remaining few Jews in the world, as well.

Though the remarks were not surprising, they were nevertheless distressing in at least three aspects:

- That the ruler of a country, in the year 2003, can still pass off such profound ignorance as enlightened opinion.
- That his audience, which included an august assembly of world leaders, received Mahathir's rubbish with a standing ovation. None of the leaders in attendance voiced even slight discomfort over the remarks.
- That the same ruler responded with indignation when he heard the reaction of the West and then proceeded to utter fresh absurdities about the Jews.

In sharp contrast to the applause conferred upon Mahathir by the leaders of Organization of Islamic Conference was the reproach expressed throughout the western world.

Canada, the United States and the European Union unambiguously condemned Mahathir's musings. Foreign Minister Bill Graham said the statement was "totally unacceptable." He also explained why it was important to condemn the remarks, and in this he demonstrated a keen understanding of the significance of the role of elected responsibility. "What is important is that we make it clear to our own citizens that we totally reject both the premise and the spirit of where this is coming from."

Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs regretted that Mahathir "could not restrain himself from resurrecting vile invectives, innuendoes and outright lies," and warned that "the civilized world has seen the results of such violent rhetoric in the past."

The resort to scapegoating by Mahathir was as repugnant as the substantive opinions he expressed. But the apparent acceptance of the scapegoating by the leaders of the Muslim world is tragic for the people they govern and potentially very dangerous for those they do not.

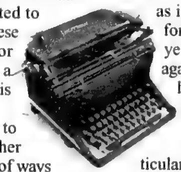
Hamas comparison wrong

I was appalled at Mel Shipman's letter ("Sharon sounds like Hamas," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Oct. 2), in which he compared Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to Hamas and claimed that "Mr. Sharon and company sound and behave like Hamas and its suicide killers."

Mr. Shipman, allow me to explain the fundamental difference between Sharon and Hamas: Hamas, Islamic Jihad and all the other terrorist groups are committed to killing as many Israelis as possible – whether these are babies in their mothers' arms on a bus or children eating pizza or families celebrating a Pesach seder, it doesn't matter. Killing Israelis is their entire reason for living.



Israel's actions, by contrast, are undertaken to protect the lives of Israelis. Sharon, like all other Israeli prime ministers before him, has run out of ways to deal with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and his lifelong dream of annihilating Israel. The only way Israelis can be protected from terrorist attacks – of which there are 35 attempts on a daily basis – is to try to cut off the head of the beast. This means killing the leaders of the terrorist groups who raise the money to buy explosives, manufacture the bombs and suicide belts, recruit youngsters to become suicide bombers and incite hatred against Israel.

Jews in the Diaspora need to understand the very critical situation Israel is in. The intifadah has all but destroyed its tourist industry and economy. The western media constantly try to portray Israel as being in the wrong. And worst of all, Israelis live each day in fear of being killed. It is a sad state of affairs when Jews in Canada are so influenced by the anti-Israel bias in our media that they begin to ask the kind of question voiced by Shipman.

Clarifies Hamas comparison

Yehuda Anshel's letter ("Condemns moral equivalency," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Oct. 9) merits a reply. First, I did not say that Israel policy toward Hamas was petty. Vengeful, punitive, provocative – yes, but not petty. Secondly, I stated that these actions were counterproductive – they do not stop Hamas from killing and they certainly do not further the cause of peace.

Finally, in terms of moral equivalency, let me close with a statement by Israeli reserve soldier Dan Goldenblatt, a Montreal-born Israeli citizen who recently went to jail rather than continue to serve in the occupied territories: "I refuse to participate in the policy of revolving and stupid revenge… And I refuse to guard the poisonous and extremely costly settlements, which are the foundation of the policy of oppression and occupation. I believe with all my heart that… I am serving the State of Israel in the most important manner."

Child sacrifice

Over the last few years, increasing numbers of Islamic youth (mainly boys, but also girls) have been choosing shahada, or self-sacrifice for the glory of God.

Islamic theology states Islam is heir to the ethical monotheism of the ancient Hebrews, and looks to Abraham as its forebear. In the Book of Genesis, Abraham is forbidden to sacrifice his son, Isaac. In fact, 3,000 years ago, or thereabouts, God cautioned the Jews against mimicking the idolatrous ways of those whose lands they were about to enter. One of the injunctions was against moloch, sending children to fiery deaths to sate the appetite of a god.

The clerics need to clarify Islamic theology, particularly for children and their parents. At what point in the history of Islam has child sacrifice become acceptable? And what god or gods are really being sated?

Designate one Shabbat for tolerance

I applaud Avrum Rosensweig ("I believe…," CJN, Oct. 2) for trying to make the community, if not the world, a better place. I take my own poll every Shabbat. I'm lucky if I get a nod, let-alone a "Good Shabbos," even after I initiate the greeting. Maybe we should designate one Shabbat in the year where we all make a concerted effort to greet our fellow Jew. If we open our hearts just a bit, improve our generosity of spirit and show tolerance and respect, our efforts will be rewarded.

Article missing information

Your article ("Canada's passport policy on Jerusalem questioned," CJN, Oct. 2) on giving a birthplace as Jerusalem rather than Israel on a Canadian passport left out important facts. Before one can understand the decision, one should know the following.

Was the person born in a part of Jerusalem that was Israeli according to the ceasefire line of 1948? Was it in the part of Jerusalem designated as international in the partition of 1947? Was it in a part of the occupied territories annexed as part of Jerusalem in 1967? Was it in parts of the occupied territories annexed to Jerusalem in later unilateral designations by Israel?

Yom Kippur, 1973: A different image of war

By PETER R. NEWMAN

I was looking out at a spectacular view from Prospect Point in Stanley Park, Vancouver, but my radio was tuned to the news. At 2 p.m., Oct. 6, 1973, Egypt and Syria unleashed co-ordinated attacks on Israel. I knew that air-raid sirens were sounding everywhere in the Jewish state, shattering the calm of Yom Kippur, the holiest day of the year. I could picture people in synagogues turning to each other in disbelief before hurrying home and scrambling to join their reserve army units.

The images of the news contrasted sharply with the peaceful beauty around me. I looked at the sea and the rich green hues of Vancouver's forested mountains. The Egyptian army, the announcer said, had crossed the Suez Canal under clouds of covering smoke and was overruning Israel's defensive Bar Lev line. Syrian fighter planes were over the Golan Heights. Israel had been taken by surprise and was completely unprepared. The beauty of the Canadian scene meant nothing to me.

I was a young doctor then living in Vancouver. I felt a strong need to be in Israel rather than enjoying the view of the mountains halfway around the world. Although I had never been a soldier, every Israeli man from age 18 to 55 was being called up to the army. Clearly Israel would need volunteers in every sector of society.

Only 436 Israeli soldiers had been manning the 175-kilometre Bar Lev Line along the Suez Canal. They were overrun by thousands of Egyptian troops, tanks and missiles. The Egyptians had new Soviet weapons technology – hand-held anti-tank weapons and better surface-to- air missiles that proved very effective. Israel would not succeed in the ground war without air support, but for the first time in its history, Israel did not have supremacy in the skies.

I listened as military analysts speculated that the Syrians and Egyptians would bomb Israel's airports. If they were right, and Lod Airport was destroyed, it occured to me that if I were to go to Israel and it was defeated, I might be unable to come back to Canada. How the Arab nations, if victorious, would treat conquered Israelis was something nobody wanted to think about.

To add to my concerns about going, I was feeling ill and my doctor was ordering tests to investigate the possibility of a serious illness. I had two small children, a wife, an exciting new career. Thoughts of illness or death put an unfamiliar weight on my spirits.

But the thought of leaving my small children behind was the most painful part of the decision-making process. It was a very difficult time for me. For Israelis, of course, it was immeasurably more difficult. I made my choice and prepared to leave.

At the first news of war, every airline cancelled their flights to Israel except El Al. Getting to Israel became virtually impossible. Faced with an impossible demand, El Al instituted a policy for distributing seats. First priority, I was told, was given to Israeli pilots who were caught overseas at the outbreak of war, second priority was given to tank crews and the third to doctors.

I flew from Vancouver to Toronto and then to New York. At Kennedy Airport, I asked a policeman for directions to the El Al terminal. He studied me closely and looked worried.

"How're we doin' over there?" he asked. I was struck by the "we."

For security reasons, El Al had been moved to the most remote edge of the airport. The scene in the terminal was chaotic. There were long lineups of people talking anxiously. It took the strained El Al employees more than three hours to check us in, and then two more hours for very thorough security checks and interrogations.

When the plane stopped to refuel in Paris, French soldiers stood on the surrounding rooftops, machine guns at the ready, guarding us. The war was starting to feel decidedly less abstract.

Arriving early the next morning, I walked along the eerily quiet streets of Tel Aviv. All the men were away in the army. Car headlights were painted blue to make the city darker at night and a more difficult target.

One consequence of Israel's being taken by surprise was the lack of any reception for arriving volunteers. We who did manage to reach Israel found ourselves entirely on our own. There was nobody around to direct us. Many volunteers had no idea where to go to be useful, or what jobs to do.

Some creative people created their own jobs. I met one young physician, just arrived from South Africa, who was upset that the lack of co-ordination prevented him from providing medical help. Undeterred, he set to work collecting garbage from the streets of Tel Aviv. The sanitation workers had been called up into the army like everybody else. The principled young doctor collected the garbage they had left behind.

Unlike some volunteers, I already had a niche in Israeli society and was fortunate that I could contribute in my own field. I had previously lived for two years in the Upper Galilee, working as a family doctor in kibbutzim, moshavim and immigrant towns. I had also worked in Druze villages as the first civilian doctor in the Golan Heights following the Six Day War.

During the Yom Kippur war, I went to the western Negev to replace a doctor who had been hurt in an accident on army manoeuvres. I moved into Nir Yitzhak, a lovely kibbutz close to the Sinai border, and drove each day to different towns and villages to give clinics for adults and children. These communities had been without a doctor for months. The patients seemed as happy to see me as I was to see them. I have warm memories of them looking me in the eye and saying quietly, "Thank you for coming. For the encouragement." I was moved by the simple sincerity. I derived great satisfaction from just being there. I felt that my presence made a meaningful, existential statement.

I also teamed up with an old friend, Peter Carlen, a Toronto neurologist then working in Jerusalem. At the outbreak of war, he volunteered in the Be'er Sheva Hospital, where many casualties from the Sinai had been brought. We were given a room in a student residence, and I entered the hospital with him.

I was startled by the sheer number of wounded soldiers. The surprise of the onslaught was now personalized in the saddest possible way. There were soldiers who had been badly burned inside their tanks. On the neurosurgery ward, young people lay unconscious, some on life-support machines. At some bedsides, X-ray screens showed fragments of metal shrapnel in the brain. Many patients were undergoing neurosurgery to remove shrapnel. Sadly, some of the X-rays showed shrapnel in the brainstem, a vital area that controls the body's most basic functions of breathing and circulation. Surgery could not be performed here, and some of these people would not recover.

I watched the caring nurses tend to their patients. In this hospital ward, the war took on an intensely human dimension. Outside, the war was portrayed very differently. The talk in the media was of territory lost or gained, of strategy, of geopolitics. Here in this quiet hospital ward, such talk seemed artificial. Here, one had an overwhelming realization that war was really about young people, full of promise, full of dreams, now struck down.

The launching of war on Yom Kippur, of all days, seemed particularly odious. I tried to imagine the thinking of Egyptian and Syrian leaders. Had they felt any hesitation before attacking on the holiest day of the year, when much of the population was in synagogue, praying? Was I naive to think that ethical considerations might influence attacks on one's enemy? If military tactics are to be subject to moral constraints, how should these constraints be balanced against the attacker's own strategic self-interest?

These questions are obvious when one thinks of the Yom Kippur attack on Israel. However, they apply equally to Israel and to every other country that uses military force.

I will always carry with me the images of those days of inhumanity. These images will never allow me to rejoice in victory. Neither, however, do they make me a pacifist at any cost. There are times when nations must use legitimate force to defend themselves from tyranny or terrorism. The challenge for fair-minded people is to retain our humanity, not just in peaceful times when it's easy, but also in the crunch, in the dark days of struggle.

For Israelis and Arabs, for Muslims and Jews, and for all of us around the world emotionally caught up in our own conflicts, the challenge is to get beyond the rhetoric of "honour" and "glory" on one hand, and "revenge" and "punishment" on the other. The challenge is also to remember the innocents of both sides who will be struck down in consequence of our deeds.

A month after the war ended, I returned to my family and to the calm of distant Canada. My own illness had resolved. I looked again at the vista of sea and mountains, and this time felt more complete. I felt changed by the experience of sharing with beleaguered Israelis such sadness and hope. I felt healed by experiencing humanity in the midst of inhumanity.

Perhaps our finest triumph, when those who cruelly attack us show no humanity, is to remember our own.

Needed: happiness warriors

It should be easy. We are constantly prodded to be merry, easygoing and jovial. Songs instruct us to "don't worry, be happy," bumper stickers carry the ubiquitous happy face logo, and even the chassidic rabbi, Nachman of Breslov, tells us it's a "great mitzvah to be constantly joyous." So how come happiness isn't as easy as a simple slogan?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Actually, happiness is often a struggle. Life can be miserable. If you don't believe me, just read the newspaper. There are terrorist attacks, suicide bombings, ethnic cleansings, civil wars, not to mention bankruptcies and unemployment. On a personal level, it seems we frequently hear about a crime, illness or death that has affected someone close to us.

And frankly, these are the good new days. For most of history, life was far more dismal.

But just because happiness is hard to achieve doesn't mean it's absurd. Rabbi Nachman was right. God intended the world to be a joyous place. And if life is, to quote political philosopher Thomas Hobbes, "nasty, brutish and short," creating happiness is our responsibility.

To transform a difficult world, we need people who understand that happiness is neither simple nor trivial. We need people willing to fight for a happier world. We need happiness warriors.

The first battleground is within ourselves. Virtually everyone has had to battle some form of melancholy. Winston Churchill even had a name for his dark moods, calling them "Black Dog." Happiness warriors never let "black dog" get the best of them. Even during their bleakest moments, they can discover a bit of joy. Steve Lipman, in Laughter in Hell: The Use of Humor During the Holocaust, documents how concentration camp inmates invented a genre of dark, yet hopeful humour. How do you beat back "black dog?" By chuckling at a wisecrack while living in hell.

But happiness warriors are not content with personal bliss. Their goal is world happiness. They may seem like ordinary people doing ordinary things, but actually they are transforming the world one smile at a time. Like the secretary who greets everyone she meets with a warm welcome. Or the college student who spearheads a fundraising campaign with his friends to help an impoverished family. Or the middle-aged woman who visits hospital patients with a thermos of chicken soup. Or the Israeli high school student who learns first aid so she can save lives in the event, God forbid, of a suicide attack.

These may be simple, small, everyday acts, but they transform an otherwise difficult world into a happier place.

Happiness warriors know they face a tough opponent. They stand armed and ready – with smiles, jokes and chicken soup.

Perhaps you'll consider joining the fight. The fate of the world depends on it.

From Kishinev to Canada: the poetics of anti-Semitism

Around the time I began teaching, some 15 years ago, it became fashionable for Jewish studies professors across North America to announce to classes: "Yours is the first generation to know anti-Semitism only as a subject of history, or a phenomenon on foreign soil."

Not all Jewish studies professors shared this conviction. But the view was prevalent enough to find its way into scholarly articles.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Jewish studies professors no longer speak that way. These days, professors sound alarmed. Like others, academics debate the pervasiveness of the "new anti-Semitism," and try to articulate precisely what defines its rhetoric and attitudes. Now, on the cusp of the new millennium, we worry about a problem whose disappearance was celebrated at the close of the last.

The phrase "new anti-Semitism" is something of an oxymoron. The term points to new ways that this old hatred is negotiated in contemporary politics. It also suggests our sense of having been blindsided.

Recently, I had occasion to reread Haim Nahman Bialik's magisterial poem, B'Ir Haharega, written exactly 100 years ago. Composed in response to the 1903 massacre of the Jews of Kishinev in Bessarabia, and ably translated by the Canadian poet A.M. Klein as In the City of Slaughter, Bialik's poem played an important role in shaping the Zionism of his contemporaries. At a recent colloquium of Israelis and North Americans marking 100 years of the event and the poem, Kishinev had an uncanny resonance.

What does Kishinev mean to us, a turbulent century later? How do past events speak to us and become meaningful for our time?

By the end of the 19th century, modernity and the Enlightenment had reached eastern Europe, affecting the lives and expectation of its Jews. In 1881, in the midst of progressive social changes, a series of government-sanctioned pogroms erupted. This was a jolt to liberal Jewish optimism.

Then, after more than two decades of calm, the massacre of Kishinev Jews shocked European Jewry. Today, after the wholesale slaughter of millions during the Shoah, the Kishinev casualties, which numbered under 50, may strike us as relatively merciful. Without our hindsight, however, the brutality and deaths were stunningly awful.

Even more, the pogrom at Kishinev was a betrayal of the promise of modernity – equality, social acceptance and of the rights of citizenship for Jews. For many, that shining vision of progress was shattered.

It struck several of the North Americans at the colloquium that we experience a similar moment of shock and betrayal, although, thankfully, without the physical destruction of Kishinev. One hundred later, the upsurge of the "new anti-Semitism"startles those who saw this hatred as safely in the past, at least for democracies.

Soon after the pogrom, Bialik came to Kishinev at the behest of a committee of Jewish leaders including Achad Ha'am and Simon Dubnow. Commissioned to write a report, Bialik interviewed survivors, filling four notebooks with testimonies. But instead of a report, Bialik composed B'Ir Haharega. Dismissing the eyewitness testimonies, he built the poem around a fiction: that the Jews of Kishinev did not defend themselves.

Bialik's poem took on a life of its own. For decades, it spoke to readers about the supposed passivity of the Diaspora Jew, distancing the inhabitants of the Yishuv from their European roots. It is not a stretch to say that in B'Ir Haharega, Bialik blames the Jews of his time for the vicissitudes of anti-Semitic violence. But what more could they have done? Overpowered by the number of assailants and by the power of the state, many resisted.

Let me be clear. My digression from 21st century Canada to pogroms of 100 years ago is not meant to suggest that we are falling backwards into history. Concordia is not Kishinev. York is not Yehupetz. On this continent, the violence has been largely confined to language.

But there are connections to consider. Today's new anti-Semitism is situated in the contemporary democratic state. Rather than following Bialik's example and focusing on Jewish internal dynamics, we might ask about the perseverance of anti-Semitism, across ideologies and regimes. When it surfaces in a modern democracy, what political ends does it serve? Even beyond naming anti-Semitic rhetoric for what it is, unravelling its uses might help us to thwart its progress.

Pay it forward

Rabbi Emanuel Forman recently alerted Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim synagogue to the plight of a young father of four paralyzed in a terror attack. The 37-year-old American oleh, Steve Averbach, rode bus number 6 early Sunday morning on May 18. Sensing something was amiss, he reached for his gun. A terrorist masquerading as a religious Jew blew himself up, killing seven and wounding 20 severely, including Averbach, who was paralyzed below the neck after a steel ball bearing ripped into his spine.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Israel's Defence Ministry has honoured Averbach, a former police officer and Golani unit hero, for saving countless lives, because the bus was about to fill up with dozens of schoolkids and commuters. Averbach regrets he did not stop the bomber – an impossible expectation he imposed on himself – and wonders how to rebuild his life. "I was always pretty strong, mentally and physically," he told a reporter. "And now… I control nothing, zero. I can't turn over, lift a hand… So they tell me that I'm my kids' father, and no one can take that away from me. But look at me, what kind of a dad can I be?… I want to walk and play with my kids, what can I do now? What does anyone need me for?"

Just before Rosh Hashanah, I spoke at an "Israel Update" to the synagogue's sisterhood. I began by reading the names of recent victims of the Palestinians' immoral turn from negotiation to terrorism. And I pleaded for the community to help Averbach. "Think of how much money we are about to spend on flowers, on wine, on brisket, on useless little presents thanking our hosts," I said. "Couldn't we redirect some of that money to Israelis for whom this New Year is bittersweet?" I challenged each member to give $1,000 to Averbach, either individually or with friends.

Remarkably, people responded to the appeal, and to Rabbi Forman's subsequent discussion in his Rosh Hashanah sermon about Averbach's new search for meaning in his radically transformed world. One woman rose at the sisterhood meeting, donated $1,000 and asked others to follow – and some did immediately. Another woman changed her holiday flower order, sending more modest arrangements with a card saying a donation had been made to Averbach's fund. A high school student inquired about raising funds at her school – and other Jewish high schools in the area. I challenged her to broaden it to other high schools with Jews and all freedom-loving people opposed to terror. A Dawson College student later launched a fundraiser through Hillel that raised $1,000 in two days.

More people asked how they could help. We were living out the rabbinic teaching "mitzvah gorreret mitzvah" – one mitzvah tugs another. We were bringing to life the recent Hollywood movie Pay It Forward, in which one good deed breeds another. "We have been offered help by so many people around the world who have heard of Steve's injuries," Steve's father wrote to the student who organized Hillel's fundraiser, "but only a wonderful few have actually done something. You are certainly among the select few." Reporting on other acts of kindness, such as the Hadassah angels ministering to Averbach and his family, the senior Averbach said, "There are many more wonderful people in the world than I ever realized."

Yes, these modest efforts barely address the financial demands of someone facing decades of rehabilitation and limited job prospects. And synagogues could do much more, from institutionalizing a twinning program as part of all bar mitzvahs and weddings, to diverting a serious percentage of their building funds to meet the devastating emergency situation imposed on Israel by Palestinian death merchants.

But the symbolic power of these donations enhances their financial impact – both as models for others and for the supportive message they transmit to victims and their families. There are five million North American Jews and fewer than 5,000 victims, meaning a ratio of one thousand potential givers to every casualty of Yasser Arafat's war.

Cash is the currency of the modern world. More of us need to use more of it to speak eloquently, morally and lovingly. "People don't realize that when they give just how much they can benefit," the president of Shaar Hashomayim sisterhood said that night. That's the power of being a part of a moral community. That's the beauty of paying it forward.

Israel adopts a tougher attitude toward Syria

Syria's president, Bashar Assad, was apparently shocked when Israeli F-16 jets struck an empty Palestinian training camp deep inside Syria on Oct. 5, a day after Islamic Jihad claimed credit for a suicide bombing in Haifa that killed 21 Israelis.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The attack, the first Israeli military strike on Syrian soil in 30 years, may have shattered an armistice agreement Henry Kissinger, the U.S. secretary of state, had painstakingly brokered in the spring of 1975 after weeks of shuttle diplomacy.

The disengagement accord, as it was known, ended a war of attrition on the Golan Heights that erupted in the aftermath of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Although Israel and Syria clashed in the 1982 war in Lebanon, these battles were strictly confined to Lebanese territory. Israel's border with Syria remained uncannily quiet as both sides observed the Kissinger agreement.

But subsequently, Israel was greatly irritated by the fact that the Syrians used Hezbollah as a proxy in southern Lebanon and permitted radical Palestinian factions, such as Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, to maintain facilities in Syria.

Israel's Oct. 5 raid, which may yet be seen as a watershed in the annals of Israeli/Syrian relations, was something of a shot across Syria's bow.

By attacking this remote base northwest of Damascus, Israel served notice that Syria will have to bear the consequences of its support of Palestinian rejectionist groups. It may not be the last such attack. Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, warned Syria that he would not hesitate to order further strikes if need be.

Sharon's warning was in keeping with the increasingly tough attitude Israel has adopted toward Syria since its withdrawal from Lebanon in May 2000. In response to Hezbollah bombardments of Israeli army positions in the disputed Shabaa Farms district on the Golan, Israel has twice bombed Syrian radar stations in Lebanon.

Israel's resolve to hold Syria directly responsible for Islamic Jihad's bombing of a Haifa restaurant has not been challenged by the president of the United States, George W. Bush. In a grand gesture of solidarity, he observed that Israel has a right of self-defence and should not feel constrained by defending its homeland. With this remark, Bush equated the United States' campaign against terrorism with that of Israel's.

When it comes to Syria, Washington's empathy with Israel has been unwavering. The Bush administration has made it clear that it will veto a pending Syrian United Nations Security Council resolution condemning Israel for its recent strike. And in the past six months, Washington has repeatedly urged Assad to close radical Palestinian offices and camps in Syria, to co-operate with Washington in the struggle against terrorism and to staunch the flow of Muslim militants from Syria into Iraq.

The United States, which claims to have had no prior knowledge of Israel's recent raid, believes that the camp was being readied by construction crews as a staging point for attacks on Israel and American soldiers in Iraq. As of last week, 103 U.S. troops had been killed in combat there since May 1.

Significantly enough, Syria did not react militarily to Israel's strike. But a day later, Syrian-supported Hezbollah gunmen, in a drive-by shooting, killed an Israeli soldier patrolling the Lebanese border near Metullah.

Assad, who has ruled his nation since his father's sudden death in June 2000, described Israel's raid as an attempt to terrorize Syria and drag it into a regional war. Syrian officials – Syria's ambassador in Spain and a spokeswoman in Damascus – warned Israel that Syria reserved the right to respond to "aggression."

It is impossible to predict what Assad will do should Israel hit Syria again. But by any objective standard, Syria would be reluctant to engage Israel in hostilities. On paper, the Syrian armed forces appear formidable. Syria can field 12 divisions, comprising 380,000 soldiers, and 3,800 tanks, 2,600 artillery pieces and 500 aircraft. Syria, too, has long-range Scud missiles capable of reaching virtually any target in Israel, as well as a stockpile of chemical and biological weapons.

But much of Syria's aging Soviet-equipped military machine is in dire need of a drastic upgrade. In addition, Syria cannot match Israel in electronic warfare and lags far behind in terms of command-and-control expertise. The last time Syria faced Israel on the battlefield, 21 years ago in Lebanon, the Syrians were completely outclassed. Today, Syria does not have the same easy access to sophisticated Russian weaponry it enjoyed during the Soviet period. Yet with five divisions on the Golan, and batteries of missiles aimed at Israel, Syria could bloody the Israelis in a confrontation.

Syria is also aware that the diplomatic balance favours Israel. As never before in its modern history, Syria is isolated, completely surrounded by unfriendly countries.

Iraq – Syria's ally in the 1948 War of Independence, the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War – has been removed from the strategic picture by the United States. With the demise of Saddam Hussein's Baathist government, a sometime rival, Syria has lost a potential ally.

To the north looms Turkey, which has close ties with Israel and which pressed Syria to deport a troublesome Kurdish leader some years ago. To the west is Jordan, which signed a peace treaty with Israel nine years ago and is firmly in the American camp. And in Lebanon, a Syrian protectorate since the second Lebanese civil war, Syria is under pressure to withdraw.

Worst of all, Syria's volatile relationship with the world's sole superpower, the United States, is currently so bad that the U.S. Congress is seriously considering imposing economic sanctions on Syria.

The Syrian foreign minister, Farouk al-Shaara, blames Israel for its poor state of relations with the United States. But this is an oversimplification.

Bashar Assad

Before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States, Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld accused Syria of producing chemical and biological weapons in violation of international treaties.

In the wake of Sept. 11, Washington improved its relations with Syria after Damascus provided the United States with credible intelligence on Al Qaeda's networks in western Europe.

Syria also ingratiated itself with the United States by supporting a pivotal 2002 Security Council resolution demanding Iraqi compliance with UN resolutions regarding weapons of mass destruction. Due to these Syrian goodwill gestures, rumours began flying that the U.S. State Department might remove Syria from its list of states sponsoring terrorism.

But Washington's sensitive and complex relations with Damascus deteriorated sharply when Syria bitterly denounced its invasion of Iraq last March.

Even as fighting in Iraq raged, Rumsfeld accused Syria of allowing hostile Syrian and foreign fighters, as well as night vision goggles, into Iraq. Meanwhile, Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state, called on Syria to stop backing Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

On April 13, four days after Baghdad's liberation and amid speculation that Syria might be the next "Iraq," Bush weighed in with harsh criticism of Syria. He said that Syria faced serious consequences by harbouring members of Saddam's former government. Acting on the belief that Syria had indeed provided sanctuary for Saddam's cronies, the United States severed an oil pipe line running from Iraq to Syria and blocked the cross-border trade routes between Syria and Iraq, thereby depriving Damascus of about $1 billion (US) in revenues.

Shortly afterward, Bush suggested that Syria had mended its ways. Riding this momentum, Powell visited Damascus and met with Syria's leadership. He hoped to convince the Syrians to back the internationally sponsored road map to peace. Powell asked Syria to shut the offices of radical Palestinian organizations, which oppose the road map. Syria reportedly assented, but drew the line at expelling their leaders.

Since then, the United States' relations with Syria have fallen into a rut again. This followed damaging disclosures that Assad was permitting militant Muslim combatants to cross into Iraq from Syria and tolerating Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad operations aimed at Israel.

Claiming that Damascus is on "the wrong side of the war on terrorism," the Bush administration has dropped its opposition to the Syria Accountability Act. The proposed bill, which was passed by the House of Representatives last week by a 398-4 margin, would ban mutual trade and business investment and reduce diplomatic contacts.

Sharon backs the legislation, and has asked the United States to raise certain Israeli demands with Syria. Israel wants Syria to oust all Palestinian radicals from Damascus, force Hezbollah to dismantle its network of missiles in southern Lebanon, eject Iran's Revolutionary Guards from Lebanon's Bekaa Valley and persuade Lebanon to deploy its army along the tense Lebanese border.

Since Syria will probably reject these demands, the current level of tension between Israel and Syria is unlikely to abate.

Bible film renders Gospel of John verbatim

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a scene in the middle of The Gospel of John, Jesus is preaching to a crowd in the Temple in Jerusalem, but he is encountering resistance to his message. Turning to a crowd of Jews, he chastises them for "trying to kill me" because he is telling them "the truth I heard from God."

When the crowd tells him they are the children of Abraham and also the children of God, Jesus, in frustration, blurts out, "Why do you not understand what I say? It is because you cannot bear to listen to my message. You are the children of your father, the devil, and you want to follow your father's desires.

"From the very beginning he was a murderer and has never been on the side of truth because there is no truth in him… But I tell you the truth and that is why you do not believe me."

The disturbing passage in the gospel is recreated, verbatim, in The Gospel of John, a three-hour film that will be released later this week in Toronto and southern Ontario. A visually sumptuous film with tremendous attention to detail in costumes and props, the film cost $20 million to make and includes a cast of 75 principal actors and 2,000 extras.

Though it debuted last month during the Toronto International Film Festival, The Gospel of John has received far less attention than the much-anticipated Mel Gibson film, The Passion of Christ, which has stirred tremendous controversy over its allegedly anti-Semitic theme.

While Gibson's focus on the crucifixion and passion of Jesus has come under fire for its message that Jews killed Christ, reviews of The Gospel of John have generally been favourable, lauding the film for its sensitive portrayal of first century intra-Jewish theological disputes.

Rendering the gospel in its entirety, word for word, creates a context to events of the time and blunts the sharper edges of the charge that Jews were responsible for the death of Jesus, said Garth Drabinsky, the film's Jewish producer.

But, he added, a film based on John cannot in any way be considered anti-Semitic.

Drabinsky said the film passed muster before a panel of biblical experts – including two Jews – who were consulted extensively on the material.

The Gospel of John itself was written 70 years after the events it portrayed, at a time when the followers of Jesus were breaking with mainstream Judaism. All the major characters in the film are clearly Jewish, including Jesus, he said.

"It has questions that challenge one concept of Judaism and from a historic perspective, it is important for people to see this transition happening, the origins of the early church."

Drabinsky, who stresses the educational aspect of the film, acknowledged that the Gospel of John has in the past been quoted "in a narrow sense" to justify an animus against Jews.

This film, he said, "allows you to look at the entire landscape and not pick one line."

From it, "more people will have a greater understanding of the issues" and will learn that "Christ was challenging and took on the establishment," he said.

Asked whether a film depicting the gospel of John might stir anti-Jewish emotions once again, Drabinsky said, "I never thought about that at all. I produced a film that is all about a Jewish world. Everybody in the film is Jewish."

He said his interest in the subject matter goes back to his days in high school, when he was fascinated by the book The Bible as History. When he was asked by the American Bible Society to participate in a project to film the Bible's 66 books (which includes the Hebrew and Christian testaments), he readily accepted.

He said he finds the period in history fascinating and thought that a word-for-word recreation of the gospel would avoid an out-of-context, Hollywood-style treatment.

Recognizing the potential difficulties that could result if the script was not just right, his first step was to bring together the advisory committee, which recommended beginning with the Gospel of John.

"It is the best-loved and most-quoted of all the books of the New Testament," Drabinsky said. "Structurally, dramatically, it is a terrific piece of writing. In many ways it is exquisite."

To soften the text's more polemical passages, which blamed "the Jews" for a variety of sins (for example, that "the Jews" urged Pilate not to release Jesus, and that Jesus avoided Judea because "the Jews" were looking for a chance to kill him), the script was based on the American Bible Society's Good News Bible. In that text, "the Jews" become "the Jewish authorities."

Alan Segal, a professor of religion at Barnard College, Columbia University, said he and the second Jewish consultant, Adele Reinhartz, "were both concerned and we wanted to make sure it was done right."

He said the Gospel of John does employ the term "the Jews" more often than other gospels, which also refer to "scribes and Pharisees," and the phrase "'children of the devil' is a very unfortunate phrase and historically through the ages has been a problem for Jews."

Segal believes that today, "ordinary Christians will not look at it as a platform for doing violence against Jews."

But it was used when Jesus was extremely angry and it was blurted out as an oath, not as a prophecy, he said.

"The fact of the matter is, that's what's there.

"The world we live in is one where the gospels are very significant documents and strangely enough, very few people understand what's in them, Jews or Christians."

Most people, he said, are familiar with only a few verses and are not aware of the entire broad sweep of the gospels.

"If you depict an entire gospel instead of just a few verses, then you give people the opportunity to see the work in the way it was written."

Unlike the Gibson film, The Gospel of John is an accurate representation of the gospel without adding or subtracting scenes that did not appear in the original texts. "If you find what's on the screen troubling, it's because the gospel is troubling," Segal said.

Analysis

Gospel of John stands to revive deicide charge

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Those behind the production of The Gospel of John say the film does its level best to avoid rekindling the age-old canard that the Jews were ultimately responsible for the death of Jesus.

To soften the message, an advisory committee of Catholic, Protestant and Jewish theologians and scholars (including three Canadians) has employed disclaimers, subtle uses of language, and emphasis on the distinctions between the Jewish public and its leadership of the day.

But the movie, which opens this week in Toronto, will likely still leave Jewish viewers – should there be any – shifting uncomfortably in their seats and tugging at their collars.

Despite the committee's efforts, the Jewish establishment of the day comes across as bloodthirsty, petty and almost flip about wanting Jesus dead.

For its part, the Jewish rabble, faced with a clear choice, picks Barabas the thief to be freed and lets Jesus die, flanked by two petty criminals.

While it's not quite on par with a movie adaptation of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, as one critic charged recently, the film clearly presents Jewish authorities as the betrayers of Jesus and the primary instigators of his crucifixion.

Like Mel Gibson's much-anticipated and already maligned The Passion, The Gospel of John stands to revive the deicide charge against Jews, and won't do much to advance Jewish-Christian relations.

To boot, it's co-produced by Garth Drabinsky, whose involvement in the project isn't likely to endear him to the Jewish community.

Those behind the camera defend against the charge that the film may stir up anti-Semitism by saying it treats Jews the same way John's Gospel does. It's a point expanded on by a member of Drabinsky's advisory committee, Adele Reinhartz, a Sir Wilfrid Laurier University professor of religious studies, specializing in the Gospel of St. John. Reinhartz, who is Jewish, told the Vancouver Sun recently that if there is a danger of the film's engendering anti-Jewish feeling, it comes in the text itself. There is a negative portrayal of Jews in the gospel, she said, and the filmmakers knew that if they wanted to be accurate, they had to show the hostility between Jesus and the Jewish nonbelievers.

Of course, that in turn raises age-old questions about the text's fairness and literary intent.

Made by Toronto-based Visual Bible International, which has produced video versions of the books of Matthew and Acts, The Gospel of John is a three-hour, word-for-word adaptation of the Book of John based on the American Bible Society's accessible Good News Bible.

John was the last of the Gospels to be written – between 40 and 60 years (some say more) after Jesus' death. It stands apart from the books of Matthew, Mark and Luke, called the Synoptic ("same eye") Gospels due to their similarities, because it states up front that Jesus is God.

University of Toronto professor Peter Richardson, who chaired the advisory committee, contends the Good News Bible is the best vehicle for blunting any misunderstandings.

"It differentiates between Jews, Judeans and Jewish authorities," he said, but that's a subtle parsing likely to escape the average viewer.

He said at the time John was written, the new church had become less Jewish and more gentile. Judaism itself was splintered – there were Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes and Zealots. It was a polemical time and John is a polemical book.

The film's opening slate makes the same argument, saying the period reflected "a polemical and antagonistic" relationship between the nascent church and the Jewish establishment.

One of the committee's Jewish scholars, Alan Segal of Barnard College, conceded that of the four Gospels, John is "the most Jewish in its subject matter, and the most anti-Jewish in its perception.

"We did a great deal of thinking and soul-searching, but ultimately, we had to do it as it was written."

But did they? In the original Greek, John used the word Ioudaioi ("the Jews") 67 times, suggesting collective Jewish involvement in opposing Jesus. The Good News Bible – and thus the film – morphs the word into "Jewish authorities," thereby sidestepping the inflammatory notion that all Jews conspired against Jesus.

So the message that the Jews killed Christ is softened by the translation, but the actual narrative, which the film can't but follow, has the Temple authorities plotting early on to kill Jesus and demanding that a hesitant Pontius Pilate give the Roman go-ahead for crucifixion.

Since the Pharisees didn't have the legal authority to execute Jesus, they hand him to Pilate, who finds the itinerant preacher has done nothing to warrant a death sentence under Roman law.

Pilate relays this to the Jewish authorities, who insist he find that Jesus has done terrible things, namely, blasphemy and working on the Sabbath.

Finally, Pilate reads the charges to Jesus, who admits to having worked on the Sabbath. Then comes the line from the High Priest, Caiaphas, to Pilate that's difficult to put a spin on: "Kill him."

Succinct enough. Caiaphas says, "kill him," so Pilate does, and washes his hands of the whole messy affair.

Despite this, Drabinsky believes the film "will illuminate understanding of both religions, and make a stronger Christian-Jewish relationship."

One can draw from it "whatever you want: Spirituality, education or pure entertainment. It's not religious outreach."

That's for sure.

Lubavitch expands presence in Richmond Hill

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Lubavitch emissaries continue to follow their mandate to bring religious amenities to underserved Jewish communities.

A case in point is Chabad of Richmond Hill, which last month opened a school-cum-shul in a storefront in a plaza at Yonge Street and Elgin Mills Road in Richmond Hill.

Rabbi Mendel Bernstein, spiritual leader of the congregation, told The CJN that he and his wife Toby moved onto Elgin Mills six years ago. Before that, they had worked at the Chabad Community Centre near Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue.

"We did research and discovered that this area is underserviced, and there was tremendous potential to build a vibrant Jewish community," Rabbi Bernstein said.

After the family moved to Richmond Hill, they started holding services in their home. The next year, he said, they started a preschool at Yonge and Elgin Mills.

The school quickly became too small and the shul too cramped, and they were pleased when a storefront in the neighbourhood plaza became available during the summer.

The preschool, Gan Shalom, now has an enrolment of 70 children, and it is staffed by seven teachers and several volunteers.

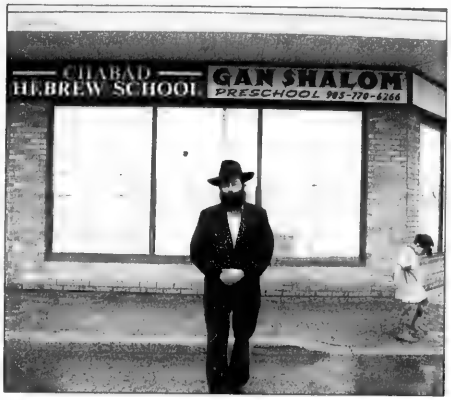
On Friday afternoons, Rabbi Bernstein said with relish, the school closes, and there is a dash to turn the school into a shul, complete with an Aron Kodesh and a bimah, both on wheels. Some 100 people attend on Shabbat, and far more came to High Holy Day services held at a nearby community centre.

"We have a core of really committed members," the rabbi said.

While most of the congregation is not religious, he said, they respond to the friendly, heimish atmosphere, which he called "addictive." Shabbat includes two children's programs, and a kiddush featuring Toby Bernstein's cholent.

There are also weekday services on Sunday, Monday and Thursday mornings.

Classes are held regularly, mainly in private homes, on such subjects as chassidic philosophy and Chumash. There are also special programs. A recent one taught participants how to make sushi.



Rabbi Mendel Bernstein stands outside the new Chabad of Richmond Hill quarters on Bathurst Street at Elgin Mills Road.

The Bernsteins occasionally hold Shabbatons, where 150 people have been known to turn out for a meal, a speaker and singing. So popular have these programs proven that "we have to have separate ones for parents of pre-school kids and for the community," Rabbi Bernstein said.

Other special events have included Chanukah on Ice last year, when the youngsters went to a local arena for a skating party; a Purim party, featuring costumes and entertainment; and a latke evening.

Last year for the first time, a public menorah was lit in the plaza in which they ultimately opened.

Last year also, realizing that most people in the area did not send their children to day school and that there were no educational facilities for them in the area, Chabad of Richmond Hill founded a Hebrew school, which meets at Silver Pines Public School.

"Last year we had 35 kids. This year, 110 students have enrolled."

The city of Vaughan has just approved a block plan that will enable the congregation to build a shul and community centre on three acres of land on Bathurst Street just south of Elgin Mills Road.

Rabbi Bernstein said their goal is not necessarily to make people Orthodox. "We are here to make Yiddishkeit more accessible to those who might not have access to it – to make people more Jewishly aware."

Argentine families celebrate Toronto

By WENDY LAMPERT

When Cynthia Strugo arrived in Toronto from Buenos Aires in August 2002 with her husband Mario and their two children, she realized that she was about to embark on a new and different Jewish life.

That's why she jumped at the chance to attend a Rosh Hashanah party, hosted by UJA Federation, JVS of Greater Toronto (formerly known as Jewish Vocational Service), Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto (JIAS) and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre to welcome Argentinean Jewish families to Toronto. The organizations sponsoring the party are core members of the Community Task Force Aiding Argentine Jews to build a dialogue with new immigrants and learn better ways to meet their needs by coordinating services. The task force also includes representatives from synagogues as well as cultural and community organizations.

"We are new immigrants, and it's very important for us to find a place within the Jewish community, to have support, and to know where we can go if we need any help," said Strugo. "Until now, we were moving in the community by intuition. It was a good opportunity to learn about what's available to us."

Monica Zalcman, who arrived with her family from Argentina in June 2002, and sits on the task force, was thrilled that more than 70 people came to the party.

"This kind of event allows new immigrants to connect with each other and with those who can give them a hand in terms of social integration, work opportunities, Jewish education and community and cultural services," she said. "Everyone had a great time. The meeting was supposed to end at 8:30, but didn't end until someone shut the lights at 10 p.m. – nobody wanted to leave!"

"The representative who spoke about Jewish education (Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation Vice President of Education) really impressed me," said Strugo, a former lawyer whose seven-year-old daughter just started attending a supplementary school program. "He was very warm and knew a lot about Jewish education in Argentina. He really touched me – he understood where we were coming from, and that was really important to me."

"This is a wonderful community initiative started on behalf of the Latin American Jewish community in Toronto. It's an attempt to reach out to families, see what we have been able to do for them, what has worked and what still needs to be done, said Janis Roth, Executive Director of JIAS. "I've already met with several families since the party. They have wonderful feedback about how they can be involved in the community, and what we can do for them. We're seeing immediate results," she added.

Director of Israel Now Consortium recognized for communal service

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

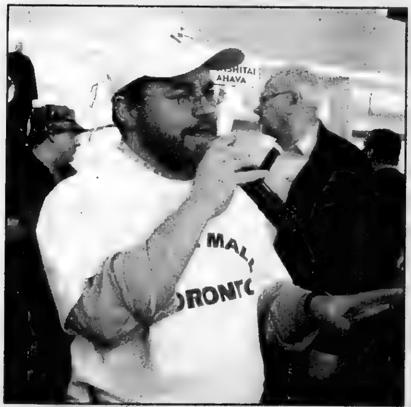
Dani Fine, the Director of the Israel Now Consortium, has been to Israel 10 times before, however, after a visit to Jerusalem this November, Fine will return home with a whole new set of memories.

He will be receiving the World Council of Jewish Communal Service (WCJCS) Exemplar Award, given to communal professionals who have displayed exemplary service to their communities during a time of crisis.

As Director of the Consortium – spearheaded by UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel – and consisting of 115 community organizations in solidarity with Israel – Fine has been at the helm of countless successful community rallies and other programs.

"I nominated Daniel Fine, because without him, we simply would not have had such an incredible myriad of grassroots initiatives ranging from incredible speakers to community vigils and rallies, that Toronto is so proud to host," says Consortium Chair, Julia Koschitzky.

"It's been a privilege to serve under the expert leadership of Julia Koschitzky," says Fine. "Her determination and insight has secured the success of the Consortium and the membership of over 115 organizations."



Dani Fine, Director of the Israel Now Consortium, helps drum up business at last March's Israel Mall at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

New immigrant to Israel realizes life-long dream

By SIMON GRIVER

On a scale of one to 10, Jonas Schwam's dream of singing in the Jerusalem Great synagogue over the High Holidays was as high as he could go. And this year, Jonas, 28, who immigrated to Israel from Argentina in July realized his life-long dream.

"I've always thought of myself as both an opera singer and chazan," explained Schwam, who often led services at the synagogue in his native Tucuman in Northern Argentina. "I would like to be like Israeli star Dudu Fisher, who is a chazzan and also sang the lead in Les Miserables on Broadway."

Jonas Schwam, 28, immigrated to Israel from Argentina in July.

Schwam's achievement in being chosen for the 30-man choir at the Jerusalem Great Synagogue is quite remarkable. This is a professional choir which pays participants for performing on Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Succot and Simchat Torah.

"I went along and asked if I could be part of the choir," he recounted. "They gave me an audition and told me I was in. Since then I've been busy at rehearsals every evening."

In Argentina, Schwam also worked as a concert pianist and helped out in the family clinic. His father Raul is an oncologist and his mother Sara is a biochemist. One of seven children, he is the only one to have made aliyah so far. "I think that all Jews should be in Israel," he stressed. "At any rate this is the right place at the right time for me."

Schwam spent two years in Israel with his parents when he was two years old but then they returned to Argentina. "But something of the language and culture stayed with me," he said. "I always loved Hebrew and singing Hebrew songs and I went to a Jewish high school."

"I did come to Israel in the early 90's and thought about aliyah," he added. "But I could not take the plunge then. This is the right time for me. The economic crisis in Argentina and rising crime also persuaded me to leave Argentina but I felt like Israel was knocking on my door and saying come now."

Schwam's aliyah and the immigration of other Jews to Israel is financed by the Jewish Agency, through the support of the worldwide Jewish Federation network.

Jewish Chamber of Commerce learns the virtues of impatience

By WENDY LAMPERT

When it comes to her business, the old saying, patience is a virtue, doesn't sit well with Beth Horowitz, President and General Manager of Amex Canada Inc.

Horowitz, who is also President and CEO of Amex Bank of Canada, told a sold-out breakfast sponsored by UJA Federation's Jewish Chamber of Commerce that impatience is a much more important trait.

Beth Horowitz

"My personal preference is for qualities like drive, determination, and an unwavering desire to win in the marketplace," she said. "I believe that virtuous impatience leads to the bold, aggressive search for new ways of doing things, the challenging of the status quo and the urge to want to make things happen now, today."

The Jewish Chamber of Commerce, is an initiative offering Toronto's young Jewish business and professional community the opportunity to meet and network with business leaders.

Horowitz, a graduate of Cornell University and the Harvard MBA program, who has spent 19 years with American Express compared her current role of CEO to that of a head coach. "As much as I push the organization to do more, I'm also the loudest cheerleader when we celebrate our successes together and I'm the most vocal spokesperson for Canada within our company."

Horowitz sees her Jewish values as similar to those of her company – integrity and respect for people, and the desire to be a compassionate member of the community.

That compassion is evident in her appreciation of Amex Canada's volunteerism initiatives. Horowitz talked about the 10th annual Amex Cares Day, on which hundreds of employees volunteer at non-profit organizations. She herself helped plant trees in Eglinton Flats Park. "We felt great about giving something back to the community," she said.

Horowitz is also a member of the Board of Governors of Junior Achievement, which has partnered with Amex Canada and the Tiger Woods Foundation on Dream Big, a new program for high school students that encourages them to articulate their own dreams and build on their strengths and abilities. "The students display a virtuous impatience to start the journey to fulfilling their own personal dream," she noted.

Passion is behind everything Horowitz does – she believes that's how she has come so far in her career. "I am drawn towards ideas, I'm inspired by people," she said. "I suppose I am a rare being in the corporate world – someone who lets my heart rule my head."

Toronto to host 2005 General Assembly

Toronto will host the world's largest assembly of Jewish leaders - the General Assembly (GA) in 2005.

Each year, thousands of professionals and volunteers from Jewish communities around the world attend the Jewish Federation - sponsored GA with world renowned guest speakers.

"I think it is fantastic, says Leslie Gales, Chair of the UJA Federation Board. "Hosting the GA will give us a wonderful opportunity to showcase our innovative and creative blueprint for the future of Toronto's Jewish community. It's also a great chance to put Toronto back on the map in the wake of the problems we've experience lately – especially SARS. As always, UJA has a great volunteer base to assist in orchestrating such an event, and we have the committed and strong lay leadership to do this."

United Jewish Communities

Natan Sharansky, the Israeli Cabinet Minister responsible for Diaspora relations, was one of last year's keynote speakers at the GA held in Philadelphia.

United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella organization for Jewish Federations, asked UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to host the 2005 event because of Toronto's reputation as one of North America's leading Jewish communities. The selection committee also considered the success of the last GA in Toronto in 1984.

"I think we're recognized as a community that is growing, dynamic, vibrant and a leader in new programs, fundraising and initiatives in the Federation community," says David Engel, Vice-Chair of the UJA Federation Board.

"I'm really excited because it also will not only showcase the work that Toronto is doing, but also show what a warm community we are." Last year's GA was in Philapelphia. This year the GA will be held in Jerusalem. Nearly 400 Torontonians and over 500 Canadians will be attending this year's General Assembly which coincides with one of Canada's largest - ever missions to Israel, the B'yachad Mission.

This year's GA in Jerusalem, which runs from November 16 to November 19, opens with a kickoff on Sunday evening, and will build on international energy as the North American Jewish community and the people of Israel come together to join this special occasion. Visits from Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the leadership of the Jewish Agency for Israel – UJA Federation's overseas partner – will help celebrate the vibrancy of Israeli culture with a display of music, dance, and entertainment.

Walk with Israel then fly to Israel

Rescued Torah scrolls accompany new immigrant from Syria to Israel

By Shifra Paiken, Keren Hayesod

Residents of Israel are accustomed to the joyous celebrations that take place on Simhat Torah, as the Torah scrolls are removed from the ark and gala processions of worshippers parade joyfully through the streets. This year, Reuven Shimon, a resident of Jerusalem's Katamon neighborhood, looked forward to celebrating the holiday in his local synagogue with special excitement, grateful for the opportunity to publicly dance with the four Torah scrolls he smuggled out of Syria, in an episode of extraordinary courage, daring, and faith.

The story began when the late Syrian president Hafez Assad announced, in the spring of 1992, that Jews would be permitted to immigrate to the United States. Like most of the Jews in his community, Shimon, a young father of six from Aleppo, requested permission for his family to emigrate. After nine months of anxious waiting, the application was approved.

But Reuven was troubled: "My father had told me to go only to Eretz Yisrael, to Jerusalem." A plan began to take shape in his mind.

Reuven went to pray in his synagogue, whose days of glory had long since passed, as the Jewish community dwindled. He looked at the magnificent Torah scrolls, each around 140 years old and worth a small fortune. "I want to take one to Israel," he thought. He came back that night and, with the silent assent of the haham (revered rabbi), removed a scroll from the ark.

He tossed and turned the whole night. "God will help me," he thought. The next night he went through the same process again, removing another Torah scroll. And the next. And the next. In four nights, he had taken four Torah scrolls home with him. He packed each Torah in a suitcase, swathed in new clothing he purchased.

With a total of 12 suitcases, Reuven, his wife, and six children boarded buses for Istanbul, leaving the country in which their families had lived for hundreds of years. When they arrived after 35 hours, it was already late at night, but as soon as he had settled his family in the hotel, Reuven took a cab to the Israeli consulate.

The consul contacted him shortly thereafter and advised him that arrangements had been made to go to Kiryat Atta, near Haifa. Reuven was adamant: "Only Jerusalem."

After several days of standoff, one of Reuven's relatives in Israel contacted a staff member at the Jewish Agency – UJA Federation's overseas partner – to see him about the family's plight. The moment Yona Betzalel heard the story, he made arrangements for the family of Syrian Jews to be received at the absorption center operated by the Jewish Agency in Mevasseret Zion, on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

At Ben Gurion airport, Reuven was approached by a stranger, who had heard of his daring rescue of the Torah scrolls. "I want to buy them, " he said, handing Reuven a signed blank check. Name your price."

"I won't take money for the Torahs," Reuven responded. "They belong to God. If I sell them to you, He can take the money back in an instant. If He wants to give me a fortune, He will."

With assistance from the Jewish Agency, Reuven was able to purchase an apartment and set up home in Jerusalem. His eldest son hopes to start law school, and the next two are studying to be dayanim, religious court judges. His younger children are still in school.

The Torah scrolls also found new homes in Israel. Reuven donated them to the head of the Syrian community in Israel, Haham Edmond Cohen, who distributed them to several synagogues in Bnei Brak and Jerusalem.

Reuven Shimon at work legacy of life

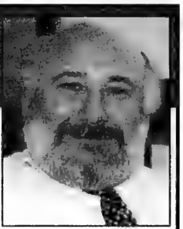
Gerry Pencer 1945 – 1998



When Gerry Pencer was in Grade Three at Montreal's United Talmud Torah, he had a teacher who would play songs on his violin for every Jewish holiday. One morning mischievous little Gerry quickly snapped all the strings off the instrument. It caused quite a commotion, yet it amused his friends to no end.

Two years later, in Grade Five, Gerry spent days digging a hole between the plaster wall of Rooms 19 and 21 so he could switch seats with a friend and confuse the teachers. He was so determined that he chipped away at the hole a little bit each day – until his father caught wind of the prank and had to pay a hefty $30 in repairs.

That was Gerry, a gregarious fellow with a sparkling personality and an infectious smile who loved the thrill of the chase and wouldn't let a few roadblocks keep him down. Despite being a tremendously busy man, he could always be counted on to serve the community, be it on UJA Federation's Arts & Entertainment executive, as Top Gifts chairman of UJA Federation's fundraising campaign in Calgary or through leadership roles at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, B'nai Brith Foundation of Canada, The Weizmann Institute of Science, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and elsewhere. He supported a wide range of charities including State of Israel Bonds, the Israel Children's Tennis Centers, and the Ontario College of Art.

"Gerry was a great guy who had tremendous enthusiasm for life," says his friend Lawrence Bloomberg, chairman of Mount Sinai Hospital. "He was a visionary and a great entrepreneur, and through his philanthropy he shared his success with the community. He instilled in his children Holly, Clarke and Stacey the importance of giving back, and they honour Gerry's memory by being actively involved in furthering his important community work."

By his own admission, Gerry squeezed two years of living into each year of his short life. He said he defied expectations from the moment he was born because his parents Harry and Clara already had two sons and Clara had been counting on a girl. He started a vending machine operation when he was in his teens and by the time he was 25, already a husband and father, Gerry was employing hundreds of people at the city's largest institutional caterer.

Gerry Pencer, age 10

Enterprising Gerry was always carving out new opportunities and looking out for the next big thing. He owned several restaurants including the Curly Joe's chain in Montreal and a meat packing company in Calgary, and developed the financial services conglomerate Financial Trustco in Calgary and Toronto. When his brother Sam asked him to join Cott, their father's little soft-drink company, Gerry went all out, transforming Cott into a multi-million dollar International success.

Gerry managed to escape to Israel with his wife Nancy whenever he could because he was passionate about building a strong Israel, and today Stacey and her husband David Cynamon are honouring Gerry's memory by targeting many of their philanthropic efforts to Israeli causes.

"Gerry taught us to be generous, to give to solid institutions, and to not hold back on how much we give," says David, head of UJA Federation's Goods and Services division. "He never sat down and preached his ways. It was just something we learned from a very generous person."

Gerry made a difference to the local community, too.

"Gerry was larger than life, and when he walked into a room people felt his energy," says Nancy. "He was so charismatic and warm that people embraced him and responded to him immediately. He was a workaholic, but when anybody needed help he was there instantly either emotionally or financially. He tried to make everybody's life easier because he felt so privileged."

Even when he was diagnosed with a brain tumor in 1997 Gerry continued to give of himself. To him, it was just another hurdle on the roller coaster of life and he wasn't going to get off without giving it his all. Undaunted by surgery and radiation treatments, Gerry thrust himself into creating The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust, the charitable organization that built and continues to support The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumor Centre at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital. Says Holly Pencer Bellman, Executive Director of The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust: "I know my father would want each patient who comes through the doors of The Brain Tumor Centre to have an experience that was a little less overwhelming than his was, and to never give up hope that a cure can be found. It is my father's dream come true. It will be a tribute to him always." The Centre is a multidiciplinary treatment and research facility dedicated to state-of-the-art treatment, research and complementary services.

"Too many people are afraid to get on the roller coaster of life and they end up being left at the station," Gerry once said. "Unfortunately, they have missed out on the exhilaration that the ride has to offer. Even though there are a few scary moments, if you're prepared to embrace and live life to the fullest you will find that the ride is well worth it."

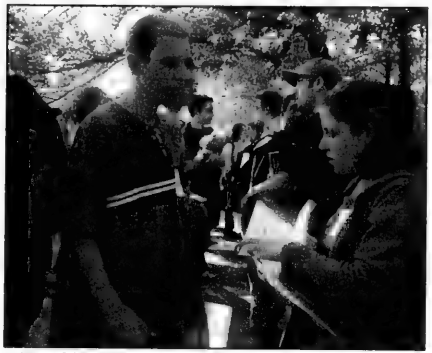
Emergency Cabinet strengthening Jewish advocacy on and off campus

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Thanks to a $1.5 million infusion from the UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) Emergency Cabinet to Canadian campuses and to the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), a number of new pro-Israel initiatives are being launched.

In its first phase of work, the Cabinet allocated funds for two priority areas: Jewish Campus Life and the Israel Missions Program.

With a $1 million increase in funding from the Cabinet for the 2003-2004 academic year, Jewish students across Canada have more Jewish programming than ever before. In fact, seven new local Jewish campus professionals were recently hired and ten more are also being recruited. The funding has also enabled the National Council for Jewish Campus Life (NCJCL) to work with an Israeli website developer to create a valuable online resource centre.



Some of the Emergency Cabinet funding goes to Jewish Campus life.

Locally, in Toronto, UJA Federation contributed $838,000 for campus services through funds raised during Campaign 2003 and a special grant of $86,000 for Jewish advocacy programs.

This past summer, four Canadians attended an Israel advocacy-training seminar organized by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee and three Canadian students were awarded scholarships to attend the Hasbara Fellowship program in Jerusalem.

Barbara Bank, chairperson of the NCJCL and her recently appointed board have spearheaded many of these new initiatives.

"The investment of the Israel Emergency Cabinet in campus life is a powerful commitment to the future of Jewish leadership, learning and survival," says Bank. "By providing us with the resources to create empowered, inclusive Jewish communities on campuses today, the Israel Emergency Cabinet is helping to build the thriving Jewish communities of tomorrow."

Support from the Cabinet also enabled Hillel of Greater Toronto to host an end-of- summer party in September with the Israeli band Reva L'Sheva, and "The Party for Peace" which attracted over 1,200 students.

"Due to the investment made by the Cabinet, we've been able to hire new professionals on campus who will enhance the lives and the education of our Jewish students," says Lance Davis, National Director, Jewish Campus Life. "It's also enabled us to bring in vibrant programs and incredible Israeli speakers. We're not missing a beat when it comes to Israel advocacy on campus."

Israel Emergency Cabinet funding has also allowed the Canada-Israel Committee to conduct in-depth research regarding Canadian perceptions of, and support for Israel.

"From the very beginning the Cabinet, as a group, demonstrated a tremendous confidence in the CIC and recognized that one of our biggest challenges was a lack of resources to do the kind of things we wanted to do," says CIC Director, Shimon Fogel. "It was the strength of that support that has allowed us to put together a new and exciting strategy that will allow us to be much more strategic in our lobbying and advocacy."

With the Cabinet's financial help, high-level missions to Israel have become a monthly reality and the CIC can tailor those trips to the needs of individual delegations.

"Missions have been universally acknowledged as the single-most effective program that we have to expose Canadians to Israel and to create for them an understanding of the challenges that Israel faces, as well as her accomplishments under difficult conditions," says Fogel. "The Cabinet's support has allowed us to increase both the quality and the quantity of these important trips."

Last year, 31 Canadian parliamentarians joined CIC in a solidarity mission to Israel during a time when the world seemed to be alligned against her.

Holocaust Education Week comes to campus

This year's Holocaust Education Week is placing much more emphasis on campus programming than ever before in its 23-year history in light of the worldwide resurgence of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism on college and university campuses.

Of the 120 programs taking place between October 30 and November 11, 20 are targeted to students.

"To me this year's Holocaust Education Week must be about educating our students - both Jews and non-Jews alike - more than ever before," says Honey Carr, who is chairing Holocuast Education Week with Joan Shapero. "With such a high rate of anti-Semitic rhetoric and activity on our campuses, education is essential to combat the naysayers. It is far too easy for people to say that the Holocaust never happened. By educating all students to the truths about our history, we are giving them the necessary tools to fight for Jewry and for Israel."

Anita Ekstein, one of this year's speakers during Holocaust Education Week

"We are so pleased that, for the first time, eight communities outside the GTA will be participating," says Shapero. "The lessons learned from the Shoah will now reach a wider audience and raise public awareness in developing a deeper understanding of our responsibility for the future."

Among the campus sites hosting HEW events this year are Ryerson University, York University and the University of Toronto.

"Each of the three campuses – Ryerson, University of Toronto and York, its own volunteer student leadership committee that is – and has been – planning all sorts of multifaceted events designed to teach Jews and non-Jews about the Holocaust," says Eli Savage, Director of Jewish Education for Hillel. "For example, at U of T, there's going to be a 24-hour name reading ceremony. This will be made up of individuals, Jewish students and students of other backgrounds who will take shifts and continually read the names of those killed in the Holocaust."

For Tova Sasson, Religion and Education Chairperson at York University, outreach to other members of the community is an important component of this year's HEW.

"While obviously keeping the focus on Jews and the Holocaust this year, I think it's also important to diversify, to reach out to others outside the Jewish community – to bring the lessons of the Holocaust into contemporary society as it is in 2003. Considering what has been transpiring on campus lately, perhaps fostering better relationships with other communities will help the situation."

The Book of Life

More than 200 people recently attended the inaugural signing ceremony of The Book of Life, a new initiative of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. The Book of Life features stories written by Jewish Foundation endowment holders and planned-giving donors about their commitment to the community and the values they wish to pass on. At the event, held at The Estates of Bayview, 35 honourees signed their stories for inclusion in the Book of Life. Pictured here are (l-r) Karen Morton, Co-Chair, Book of Life; Zahava Lambert, Judaic and metal artist who, along with Ruth Warcheca, helped design the Book; and Gella Rothstein, Co-Chair, Book of Life. (Photo by Eve Marks)

Lubavitch rabbi receives police uniform

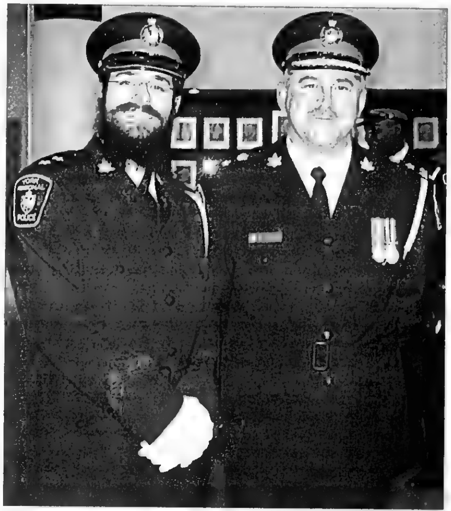
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The founding rabbi and spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo early this month became a chaplain with the York Regional Police.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan received his badge and shield along with another chaplain and 24 new police officers in a ceremony held Oct. 3 at the York Region council chambers in Newmarket.

York Regional Police provides chaplaincy services to members of the police force and their families. In addition to lending assistance and support, chaplains also attend official police ceremonies and presentations.

When performing his duties, Rabbi Kaplan will wear the official police chaplain uniform.



Rabbi Mendel Kaplan (left) and York Regional Police Chief Armand La Barge.

In an interview, the rabbi said he has helped the police before, offering advice and whatever assistance he could. During the summer, he was asked to become a chaplain – the only Jewish police chaplain in Canada.

"The police chief [Armand La Barge] wanted to have a closer relationship with the Jewish community, and he felt that this would be a good way to do it," Rabbi Kaplan said.

He said he was proud and honoured to assume this position.

Most of his work will be with members of the police service (only about one per cent are Jewish in York Region), but he said he will be available to help anyone who needs it.

Torah in Motion conference set for Nov. 2

Torah in Motion's second annual all-day conference, "Renewing Our Spirit; Self, Family, Nation", will be held Nov. 2 at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation.

Torah in Motion's goal, according to its Web site, is to inspire Jewish living and learning in an open and supportive environment through conferences, symposia, special speaker series and educational seminars, in order to foster a higher level of inquiry and spiritual development.

Its aim is "to foster a community of passionate Jews sensitively engaged with the modern world through the prism of Jewish law, values and traditions."

Conference topics include post-secondary Orthodox education; religious extremism; the importance of studying chumash; overcoming the stigma of mental illness in the Orthodox community; dating; the situation in the Middle East; the impact of the teachings and life of Rabbi Yosef Ber Soloveitchik; and the relationship between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox.

Speakers include: Marty Lockshin, director of the Jewish studies program at York University; Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa; William Helmreich, director of the Conflict Resolution Center, City College, N.Y.; Tamra Wright, director, Bradfeld Fellows Program, London, England; Rabbi Menachem Leibtag, founder of Yeshivat Har Etzion Virtual Beit Midrash and the Tenach Study Centre in Israel; and David Shatz, professor of philosophy at Yeshiva University and adjunct professor of religion at Columbia University.

The conference is being organized by Rabbi Jay Kelman, his wife Ilana Kelman, and Elliott Malamet.

The cost is $36, and $18 for students. Lunch is included for those registered by Oct. 26.

Subjects covered in the past have included business ethics, medical ethics, evolution, and the relationship of orthodoxy to the modern world.

Among other programs planned for the near future is one on Nov. 23 called "Protecting Our Kids," with David Mandell of Ohel, an organization designed to help troubled youngsters, and "Jews, Christians and the Bible", scheduled for Dec. 25.

Habonim Dror shaliach brings Israel to Ontario

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Omer Eshel, the new educational director of Habonim Dror and Camp Gesher, is intent on bringing Israel to Ontario.

Israel unites Jews worldwide, says Eshel, also the Israeli shaliach for Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), a partnership between UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Eshel, 25, grew up on Moshav Merhavia, graduated from Hebrew University and worked as executive director of the Dead Sea Scrolls site in Jerusalem.

Habonim Dror, a left-wing youth Zionist movement established in more than 20 countries, is "based on several pillars of belief including Judaism, socialism and Zionism," he says.

"Our strength is in our pluralism; we're open-minded. Everyone is welcomed into our movement as long as they are comfortable with our ideology.

"We offer activities for youth, including a fall and winter seminar, as well as lectures and programs for adults. We cater to those who are secular as well to those who are more observant."

Camp Gesher, the movement's overnight camp located in Cloyne, Ont., offers regular camp activities, he says, "but we also provide programs that strengthen campers' bonds with Judaism. Judaic activities give campers a feeling of belonging and offer them a future."

Eshel, who as a youth belonged to Haoved Vehalomed, Habonim Dror's sister youth movement in Israel, says, "We drip [the ideology] slowly until campers become proud socialist Jews. I would like to see Judaism and Zionism become part of their daily lives."

It is essential for kids to know about their identity, he says.

"If they can say 'I am a Jew,' then they can help strengthen the bond between Israel and the Diaspora. By attending Habonim Dror activities and going to Camp Gesher, they are doing their part.

"Israel is the safety net for all of the Diaspora, and if they do not see that then history could repeat itself. Knowledge is power. A youth who can express his opinion has more self-confidence, and this self-confidence can shape them for life."

Eshel, along with Galit Germanov, Habonim Dror's Ottawa shlichah who will also be at camp, would like to see counsellors run the camp. "We are there along with the director to oversee things, but we want the counsellors to be empowered; it is their home. Treating them like adults increases their feeling of belonging."

Eshel plans on travelling across Ontario as part of his RJCO role. "I want youth in the whole province to be a part of our activities, all of which revolve around Judaism and Zionism."

A favourite activity involves passing around a flag and asking participants to talk about it. "When they get to the Israeli flag, many kids say it represents Judaism. Israel is a country like no other – it is a land of Jews, not a land of Israelis."

Eshel and representatives of other youth groups in the GTA are currently planning a memorial to the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin at the Lodger Centre Congregation on Nov. 14, the International Day for Tolerance.

"Working together with other groups goes well with our ideology. We want to see people there from all over the rainbow."

Eshel will also be giving lectures on the Dead Sea Scrolls to groups of all ages.

"The more I work, the less I miss home," he says.

Jewish Life

Compromising for a sense of commuity

By ELISHEVA GOULD

At the end of August, I made the big move out of my parents' home in Toronto to New York City.

Guest Voice

As a participant in AVODAH: the Jewish Service Corps, I have made a year-long commitment to work at a non-profit organization in Manhattan, living in Brooklyn with nine other "AVODAHniks" (another house of eight is a few subway stops away) and meeting several times a month to discuss social justice issues and the logistics, challenges and rewards of Jewish communal living and community building. Phew.

It's not easy, but it's incredibly exciting. The week that we moved in to our bayit in the Red Hook/Carroll Gardens and Crown Heights/Prospects Heights neighbourhoods in Brooklyn – originally from Toronto, Montreal, Israel, England and various states, including Michigan, Texas, Maryland, Florida, Kentucky and California – we began to realize how much we have to learn this year.

My fellow housemates and I, after a long, tiring day of travelling and shlepping, had to decide how the 10 of us would share nine rooms on 3 floors of one rickety, old house! Picking rooms – or, Heaven forbid, roommates! – was something that this group of exhausted 20-somethings who had just met was dreading. But at 10 p.m., after our first shared meal, we discussed the most equitable ways to divvy up and select our rooms. And we all ended up pretty happy.

I have come to understand that what one often assumes will be the hardest issue to deal with can, in fact, be the easiest, and vice versa. This is what seems to happen when you work with a great bunch of people with common passions and goals. We've all been having a great time living together, bonding, and truly getting to know one another – our families, our university experiences, our love of Israel and our friends. And what do all Jews inevitably end up discussing when they sit around a table together? Food!

Elisheva Gould

We all knew that food would be an integral part of our communal living experience this year, but few of us expected it would be such a major obstacle to group cohesion. We have to share accommodations during this year of service, as going home to separate apartments at the end of a long, difficult workday would be a frustrating and isolating way to live. But the AVODAH program does not dictate that we must share food. If and how we do so is up to us, and it is more taxing than one would think!

Ten intelligent young Jews have 10 vastly different preferences for milk, cheese, bread, meat and breakfast cereal. For instance, I have a wheat intolerance that requires me to eat healthier alternatives. My housemate Rachel Birnbaum, a fellow Torontonian, also prefers wholesome breads. However, we have housemates who simply prefer white bread or who, because of our program's modest stipend, grocery shop on a tight budget. Then there are the vegetarians, those who prefer organic food and still others who would consider their kitchen treif if one of us were to cook in it on Shabbat.

A special, conscious element of the program is that all AVODAHniks come from different Jewish upbringings and have varying degrees of Shabbat and kashrut observance. Conveniently, our house has two kitchens, and we decided to make one as strictly kosher as is our most observant housemate. The "not-so-kosher" kitchen is for cooking on Shabbat or preparing unhechshered food without offending anyone else.

The Jewish communal living aspect of AVODAH – the opportunity to pool our finances and share food – demands challenging personal compromises. But my housemates Sharon, Tami and Raffi can't compromise their level of kashrut, Rachel and I don't want to compromise our healthy eating habits, and Yuval and Ali shouldn't have to compromise their budgets… right? These are the sorts of questions that our "intentional community," one that we are deliberately trying to form and nurture, deals with every day. As I write this, we are preparing for tomorrow's major house meeting on food sharing, finances and the "state of the soul" of our home. Stay tuned as the compromising and learning continue.

The Fruit of the Tree

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

On Simchat Torah, we begin to read the Torah from the beginning and again we acquaint ourselves with the creation of the world and the beginnings of humanity.

Midrashic Moments

We usually study the first events of Genesis as isolated narratives. First we learn of Adam and Eve and their sin. Once that story resolves with the exile of humanity from the Garden of Eden, we proceed to study the narrative of the first brothers, Cain and Abel. However, all things in Torah are in dialogue with each other and likewise the story of Adam and Eve and the story of Cain and Abel are intimately connected.

Of course, there is the obvious family connection. Adam and Eve are the parents of Cain and Abel. Yet there are further parallels to the events. Adam and Eve are the first human beings created on earth. Cain and Abel are the first human beings born on earth. Both connote unique beginnings. Adam and Eve are the world's first couple while Cain and Abel are the world's first siblings. Again, both connote unique beginnings.

But an even more subtle, continuous thread weaves through these two narratives. Adam and Eve commit their sin by eating from the fruit of a forbidden tree. The punishment for this sin is death. And yet, neither Adam nor Eve dies on that day. We understand that the pronouncement of death is not particular to Adam or Eve, but is a pronouncement on all humanity. Hence death as an entity enters the world on that day. The enactment of that punishment occurs with their children, their fruit.

The image of a tree is an important one in Genesis. The Tree of Knowledge and the Tree of Life are specifically named within the Garden. We are not told the name of any other growing thing. Adam and Eve eat of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge and as a result mortality enters the world. The first death happens because one of their children kills the other. It is their own fruit that ushers the reality of death into the world.

We are not to see ourselves as the descendants of Adam and Eve but rather as the fruit they bore. Humanity, more than belonging to a family, is to be considered parts of one living entity. Although we do not ultimately seal our fates, for only God has ownership of life, we certainly help to shape our fates.

We must learn from the creation narratives that an attack on one is ultimately an attack on all. All of humanity is responsible for preserving the lives of the innocent and the body human.

Talmud Pesahim expresses this when it states: "The arrow maker is slain by his own arrow – paid back by the devisings of his own hands."

Do you blog Jewishly?

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

In the ever-changing world of the Internet, one of the newer phenomena is the "blog" or Web-log. These Web sites are souped-up diaries that can give you incredible insight to the views of ordinary people around the world. As you might expect, they can be informative, narcissistic, revealing and frustrating, especially when people are sharing thoughts about Judaism and Israel. Add the fact that many of them are anonymous and you get a potent mix that will stimulate you and probably get you angry, too. Today, a guided tour.

Before we start, I'd like to point out that sharing thoughts on the Web is nothing new. But software programs such as Blogger [http://new.blogger.com/] allow people to create extensive personal diary Web sites without having to learn the sometimes arcane HTML Web site language.

At "Heimishtown," you'll find a word of Torah and thoughts about the author's home life. Here's one interesting complaint I came across. It seems that the blogger's husband is "an anything-you-need-I'll-do-it guy." And that, apparently, is the problem. "It has been extremely difficult for me to let go and let him pitch in. I feel it lessens me as a wife, mother, female, person." Check out the site for reaction to her predicament [http://heimishtown.blogspot.com/].

Over at a site titled, "Somewhere on the A1A...," blogger Ocean Guy muses on the intifadah and the Arab slant on the Yom Kippur War [http://oceanguy.blogspot.com].

But you can be well-known and keep a blog, too. Check out the site of Middle East commentator Daniel Pipes [http://www.danielpipes.org] or, for something a bit less controversial, check out Ari Davidow's Klezmer Shack Web-log for his latest thoughts and travels in the world of klezmer [http://www.klezmershack.com/]. You can find links to many more Jewish blogs at the Jewish Bloggers NetRing [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Q23051436].

The tag to AidelMaidel blog's is "Just what it sounds like – a nice Jewish girl in NYC." You can read her musings about matchmaking, missionaries, preparing a cleaning schedule for Passover (eight months in advance!) and being a worried mother. "Baby awoke this morning crying, brought her into my bed and she cuddled up to me and fell back asleep. When she decided it was time for me to get up she promptly crawled onto my back and started whacking me in the head. I checked her temperature to find (Hurray!) that it was 98.8. Baruch Hashem. Neurosis in check" [http://www.aidelmaidel.blogspot.com/].

Blogger Hasidic Rebel is "repulsed by so much that I believe is wrong within the chassidic community. But there is a lot that I love about it, too. I despise the tribalism, the indifference to the yearnings and aspirations, joys and sorrows of mankind as a whole... But I also have a deep love and respect for the Chassidim's devotion to their lifestyle. I am touched by the reverence they display for their leaders. Their kindness and generosity are overwhelming, at least when benefiting their own" [http://www.hasidicrebel.blogspot.com].

Hasidic Rebel's articles include "Conflicts of the Heart," "Raising Rebels" and "Charedi Men in the Workforce? (gasp) God Forbid!" His blog hit the radar of the general media earlier this year with a feature article by the Village Voice's William O'Shea. In it, Hasidic Rebel explained why he keeps his identity secret. "My children could be expelled from their schools. I could be told to leave the community. It would cause tremendous, tremendous pain for my family" [http://www.villagevoice.com/issues/0329/oshea.php].

Unlike such solo efforts, Protocols is a group blog that draws on the strengths of five contributors who give their own take on Jewish content in the Internet and print media. The entries are consistently timely, well-written and thought-provoking. Recent topics of discussion include a look at the film Trembling Before G-d, the historical validity of the Rosh Hashanah/Yom Kippur prayer Unetaneh Tokef and the halachic implications of pre-emptive shootings of hijacked civilian airlines [http://protocols.blogspot.com]. If you only have time for one Jewish blog, make it this one.

Next week, blogs from Israel and the best Hebrew bloggim.

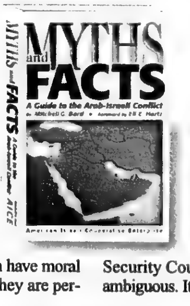
Israel and the UN

MYTH:

Israel's failure to implement UN resolutions is a violation of international law.

FACT:



UN resolutions are documents issued by political bodies and need to be interpreted in light of the constitution of those bodies. They represent the political viewpoints of those who support them rather than embodying any particular legal rules or principles. Resolutions can have moral and political force when they are perceived as expressing the agreed view of the international community, or the views of leading, powerful and respected nations.

The UN Charter (Articles 10 and 14) specifically empowers the General Assembly to make only non-binding "recommendations." Assembly resolutions are only considered binding in relation to budgetary and internal procedural matters.

The legality of Security Council resolutions is more ambiguous. It is not clear if all Security Council resolutions are binding or only those adopted under Chapter 7 of the Charter. Under Article 25 of the Charter, UN member states are obligated to carry out "decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter," but it is unclear which kinds of resolutions are covered by the term "decisions." Regardless, it would be difficult to show that Israel has violated any Security Council resolutions on their wording, and the council has never sanctioned Israel for non-compliance.

live on campus and who eat all their meals in the temporary structure during the eight days of Sukkot, were particularly affected. (An on-campus kosher restaurant had two small sukkot for them, she added.)

"We're incredibly upset about this," said Klein. "It attacks us at the level of our faith and our religion. There's nothing political about a sukkah." The sukkah programs were also non-political, she said.

"We set it up in good faith. We want very badly to share our culture and our religion with the rest of the community. That makes it an even harder slap in the face."

Saperia had felt that things were calmer this year on campus. The day the sukkah was set up, he helped staff a Hillel table filled with pro-Israel literature, and engaged in debate and discussion with a varied group of passers-by.

Among the tensions last year, a woman protesting the upcoming war in Iraq was charged with assault after a Jewish student said the protester grabbed and kicked her during the demonstration.

"I hope this [sukkah vandalism] doesn't foreshadow any negative things to come," said Saperia. "There's been disagreement and debate. That was legitimate, but this is not legitimate. This is not right."

The university released a statement by President Lorna Marsden, saying the university is committed "to fostering an environment founded on mutual understanding and inclusivity" and expressing "deep concern" and condemnation in response to the sukkah's destruction.

"Although the motivation and identity of the individual or group responsible is unknown, disrespect for any religious structure is unacceptable and must be taken seriously by any society that values religious tolerance," she said.

In a separate incident, graffiti was discovered last Wednesday on the Bora Laskin Law Library at the University of Toronto. The words, "End Israeli Apartheid," were painted in black on the rear wall of the library overlooking Philosopher's Walk.

Alan Dershowitz makes his case for Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Review

Israel has been under siege for decades, scorned as a pariah state by its enemies and detractors. But in the past three years, since the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising and the rise to power of Ariel Sharon, Israel has come under even further persistent attack.

Alan Dershowitz, a Harvard University law professor and pro-Israel activist, comes to Israel's defence in The Case for Israel (John Wiley & Sons), a tightly argued book that poses, and refutes, common accusations against Israel.

Is Israel a colonial, imperialist state? Did European Jews displace Palestinians? Did Israel create the Arab refugee problem? Did Israel start the Six Day War? Has Israel made serious efforts at peace? Does Israel torture Palestinians?

These are among the varied questions Dershowitz considers. He approaches each one like a trial lawyer, stating the accusation, identifying the accusers, laying out the "reality," and providing the "proof."

In addressing "the court of public opinion," Dershowitz offers a spirited defence of Israel's basic right to exist, to protect its citizens from terrorism and to defend its borders.

His premise is that a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute is both "inevitable and desirable." He dismisses a one-state solution as "elitist and impractical."

What drives his argument is the fact that Israel, alone among the countries of the world, is continually singled out. "Israel has been subjected to a unique double standard of judgment and criticism," he claims.

Yet Dershowitz does not accuse all critics of Israel of anti-Semitism. He, too, has been critical of certain Israeli policies and actions.

"So long as criticism is comparative, contextual and fair, it should be encouraged, not disparaged," he writes. "But when the Jewish nation is the only one criticized for faults that are far worse among other nations, such criticism crosses the line from fair to foul, from acceptable to anti-Semitic."

Dershowitz has been working on this book since the 1967 Six Day War, when he initially began to defend Israel on university campuses and in the media, two of the battlegrounds where Israel is chronically attacked. But the events that prompted him to write The Case for Israel were the collapse of the Camp David talks in the summer of 2000 and the intifadah that followed.

Dershowitz is open to debate on the core issues, but he makes the valid point that there can be no "reasonable disagreement" on "the basic facts."

First, the Jews who came to Palestine at the end of the 19th century had "an absolute right" to settle the land of their ancestors.

Second, they established a Jewish homeland in parts of Palestine they had purchased from absentee Arab landlords.

Third, they displaced very few Arab peasants.

Alan Dershowitz

Fourth, they accepted proposals, based on international law, for a partitioned Jewish homeland in areas with a Jewish majority.

Fifth, virtually all Palestinian and Arab leaders, until quite recently, rejected solutions that included a Jewish state or homeland.

In the strongest chapters, Dershowitz shines like a beacon.

Refuting the oft-heard assertion that Israel is a colonial state, he reminds readers that Jews did not immigrate to Palestine at the behest of foreign states. And, he notes, imperialist powers tried to thwart the establishment of a Jewish homeland (at least until the 1917 Balfour Declaration).

As for the charge that Israel is racist, Dershowitz points out that the Law of Return, which entitles Jews and their families to become Israeli citizens, is not unique in the region.

He is on weaker ground when he suggests that Israel has "stood ready" to accept Palestinian statehood. Only since the Oslo process has this been true. And as Dershowitz doubtless knows, the Likud party, as distinct from Sharon, still opposes a two-state solution.

Turning to the subject of settlements, he does not really address the proposition that they are a major barrier to peace. He disingenuously dances around the issue. However, in his summation, he refers to "the misguided occupation" and "the wrong-headed expansion of settlements."

To Dershowitz, the real impediments to peace are self-evident: the unwillingness of "many Palestinians" and some Arab states to accept Israel's existence and the Palestinian insistence that the refugees have a right "to return" to their former homes in what is now Israel.

Physician Opportunities in Barrie, Ontario
Where lifestyle, community & professional satisfaction meet

Barrie has been recognized as the most rapidly-growing city in Canada, and with this growth, Barrie is experiencing a significant need for physicians in a wide range of specialties, including Family Practice. The state-of-the-art Royal Victoria Hospital in Barrie is a brand-new 500,000 square foot regional Hospital.

Barrie is home to a growing and dynamic Jewish community. While the construction is underway for a new synagogue, the congregation meets locally to observe Shabbat, holidays and community programming. The Jewish and medical communities are welcoming and warm! Please leave a message at Am Shalom Synagogue 1-705-721-6126.

Barrie offers a unique blend of large city amenities with small town charm. Moments away from ski resorts, beaches, and cottage country, you will enjoy theatre, golfing, boating, skiing and cycling. Only 45 minutes north of Toronto, our traffic is negligible and real estate affordable.

Yes, vegetables are served for dessert

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

When it comes to sweets, Stephanie Silver knows her stuff.

Though only 20 years old and part way through her culinary studies at Humber College, she recently began working full time as a pastry chef and she is getting raves about her desserts.

"I enjoy working as a pastry chef because I get to combine my artistic ability with my passion for pastries," says Silver, who spent years developing her talents as a classical oil painter.

"I love creating my own recipes and making my cakes and cookies look as great as they taste. I get a great sense of accomplishment from making desserts that people really enjoy."

Silver grew up baking cakes, cookies and breads with her mother Judy, who also loves to bake.

"Dessert was our favourite part of every meal," says Judy, as she watches her daughter whip up one of their family's favourite desserts – Swiss carrot cake. "We always loved impressing our family with incredible desserts – especially on birthdays and during Jewish holidays."

But Stephanie hadn't seriously considered pursuing her passion until January 2003.

"I studied for one year at York University, and the following year I completed a semester in a fine arts program at Humber College, but I just wasn't fulfilled," she says.

She finally decided to follow her heart and switched to a culinary management program. She also began taking additional evening and weekend courses in baking, cake decorating and chocolate works at George Brown College. This year, she will continue to pursue her degree while maintaining her job at a cafe. Though her schedule promises to be exhausting, Silver is happier than ever.

Silver is pleased to share with CJN readers her recipe for Swiss carrot cake. Delicious, light and seasonal, this dessert is sure to sweeten any meal.

RUEBLI TORTE
Classical Swiss Carrot Cake

This recipe is excellent for people with celiac disorders.

5 eggs, separated
1½ cups sugar
1½ cups ground almonds
1½ cups carrots, finely grated (squeeze out as much liquid as possible) juice of 1 lemon
zest of 1 lemon
3 oz. cornstarch
a pinch of cinnamon
a pinch of ground cloves
1 tbsp. baking powder
a pinch of salt
4 tbsp. Kirsch
2 tbsp. apricot jam, for glazing
fondant icing
candied carrots (see recipe below)

Heat oven to 350. Line 2 8-inch round pans with parchment paper.

In a large bowl, cream together egg yolks, half the sugar, lemon juice and lemon zest. Add the grated carrots and ground almonds. Mix in the cornstarch, cinnamon, ground cloves, baking powder and salt. Add the Kirsch.

In a separate bowl, whip the egg whites to soft peaks (egg whites should be at room temperature before whipping). Gradually add in the remaining sugar, beating until stiff peaks form.

Carefully fold the egg whites into the carrot mix. Pour the batter into the prepared pans and bake for approximately 25 minutes or until a wooden skewer comes out clean. Cool in the pan for a few minutes and then turn out onto a cooling rack.

To make the glaze, heat apricot jam and fondant in a bowl over a pot of simmering water. The glaze is ready when it reaches a runny consistency. Cool slightly. Pour glaze on top of the cake and spread out evenly. Let the glaze run down the sides of the cake.

Candied Carrots:

Measure equal amounts of water and sugar. Bring the sugar solution to a boil. Cook baby carrots in the syrup until nearly cooked and allow the carrots to cool in the syrup (this can be prepared a day in advance). Wipe off excess moisture from the carrots and then decorate around the top of the cake. Makes two 8 in. round cakes.

Note: the sides can be coated with toasted sliced almonds. This recipe is rich, so consider this when portioning slices.

Alternative topping:
10 oz. cream cheese at room temperature
3½ oz. butter, softened
2 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. grated orange or lemon zest
2 tbsp. lemon juice
3 cups icing sugar, sifted

Beat the cream cheese until smooth. Gradually beat in butter, honey, zest and lemon juice. Gradually add in icing sugar until the mixture is thick enough for spreading.

Vancouver Hillel withdraws from multi-faith conference

By ARIEL ZELLMAN
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Hillel Jewish Student Association of the University of British Columbia recently pulled its support from a multi-faith conference held on campus.

The move was in response to the organizers' withdrawing an invitation to Vancouver city councillor Tim Stevenson to moderate the discussion after they learned that he is gay and an advocate for homosexual marriage.

The event, organized by the Ahmadiyya Muslim Students' Association, was meant to be a forum in which religious leaders from Islam, Christianity, Sikhism, Judaism, and Hinduism would present their views on the subject of the conference, "The Existence of God and Human Suffering."

Vancouver Mayor Larry Campbell, who had been scheduled to moderate the discussion but was unable to attend, recommended Stevenson, an ordained minister of the United Church of Canada.

The organizers' refusal to allow Stevenson to participate and Hillel's withdrawal from the conference has caused a minor flurry in local media and brought considerable attention to the controversy.

Alice Baum, Hillel's program director, said, "That's discrimination, no matter what you think of homosexuality or gay marriage. The Muslim group came here to discuss with us why we withdrew and ask us to reconsider.

"All they kept talking about was that Jews also do not believe in gay marriage and we should therefore support them. They did not understand that our withdrawing was not a comment on gay rights, it was a statement on discrimination."

Hillel withdrew its support for the conference following students' requests.

Hillel president Gordon Brandt said Hillel tries to create an open and positive atmosphere for students of all backgrounds and lifestyles.

"Withdrawing from the conference was necessary to maintain our sense of inclusiveness and many Hillel students and other campus groups have expressed their appreciation to us as the only organization to withdraw its support from this event."

Rabbi Ross Singer of Shaarey Tefilah Synagogue spoke at the conference, said Baum, "[because] we felt that engaging with someone does not imply acceptance of their behaviour. For him to participate as a speaker he was simply participating in an inter-religious debate and we felt that was really important."

Despite this controversy, Hillel students and staff still hope to promote further interfaith dialogue on campus and participate in more activities with Muslim students on campus in particular, said Baum.

"We still sincerely hope that in the future we'll still be able to work with them."

Students gain fresh perspective on Israel at advocacy conference

BY SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to The CJN

Students at a recent Israel advocacy and social action conference said the pro-Israel message of Muslim television personality Irshad Manji was powerful and refreshing.

Manji, the author of the new book The Trouble with Islam, kicked off the JUMP (Jewish University Multi-Track Program) conference last month in Niagara Falls with a lecture titled "Defending Israel is Defending Diversity."

"Irshad's address connected my feelings of loving Israel and the values of tolerance, multiculturalism and democracy that we hold so dear in Canada," said Aliza Libman, a third-year Jewish education student at York University.

"Her message was embraced by the students, who have taken on her challenge to ask tough questions and stand up for their beliefs," said Tilly Shames, director of Israel Affairs for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

More than 100 university students from Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and New York attended the intensive weekend event, which was divided into three tracks: beginner Israel advocacy, advanced Israel advocacy and social action. Students who participated in the social action track explored Jewish texts as well as international and local issues related to homelessness and hunger.

Many students were "beginner Israel advocates," Shames said, adding there were also students who are involved on campus but do not have an interest in Israel advocacy.

"By bringing these groups together, they were able to learn from one another and share their experiences during our common sessions," she said.

International speakers included Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch; Michael Eglash, co-founder of Upstart Activism, based in Israel; Hagai Segal, professor of Middle East Studies at the London School of Economics; and Michelle Lackie, Tzedek Hillel director from Washington, D.C.

Israeli Consul General Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh and Darryl Borden, director of Homelessness Initiatives for Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, also spoke.

Most students were pleased with the event and felt it gave them a strong introduction to the Israel advocacy work ahead of them this year.

The speakers "showed the truth about issues concerning today's Jewish students," said Noam Gilboord, a first-year student at University of Toronto, who was on the social action track.

"Students will be able to go back to school feeling proud to be Jewish, proud to be Zionists, and proud to be supporters of Israel," said Jordie Saperia, 20, president of Hillel at York University.

However, one participant said the usefulness of the event only went so far.

"Efforts for Israel advocacy can only do so much," said Alan Rashkovsky, a third-year engineering student at U of T. "What Israel really needs to ensure her future is for these young, educated people to make aliyah, and the community does not do enough of a job of emphasizing that."

But the conference was sponsored by the Israel Aliyah Centre and University Student Division (USD) Hagshama, the North American arm of Hagshama, which provides information for young people who are planning to make aliyah. (It was also sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto, Betar Tagar, the youth wing of Herut Likud, the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative and the Jewish Agency for Israel.)

The event provided students with a pluralistic Shabbat experience, with different denominational services and time for socializing and networking.

"Israel affairs are an important part of Hillel, but they shouldn't take over the entire agenda," said Tova Sasson, 20, religion/education chair of Hillel at York University. "This conference is a great way to start the year, because it integrated other aspects of Hillel programming."

Mat Abramsky, co-chair of the Israel Action Committee at the University of Western Ontario, added, "The programs were particularly useful as an opportunity to network with activists and fellow Jewish students on campus. As active students, we need the ability to share knowledge, materials and resources."

Shames said she is proud of how committed the students are.

"I have every confidence that they will be effective and successful this year."

Sask. premier fires two over offensive cartoon

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two high-ranking members of the Saskatchewan New Democratic party were fired last week because of their involvement in distributing a cartoon that compared Elwin Hermanson, the leader of the opposition Saskatchewan Party, to a Nazi officer loading NDP supporters into a rail boxcar.

Saskatchewan Premier Lorne Calvert acted quickly to defuse a potentially embarrassing situation in the midst of an election campaign, apologizing personally to leaders of the Jewish community and then issuing a public statement condemning the cartoon.

"It is entirely and unequivocally inappropriate that… any events surrounding the Holocaust from the middle of the past century, one of the dark chapters of human history, are in any way trivialized," Calvert said. "It is equally and also unequivocally inappropriate that Mr. Hermanson should have been characterized in a drawing in this way."

Dave Degenstien, an assistant to the Minister of Highways, was fired for circulating an e-mail to NDP members suggesting a drawing be made using Holocaust imagery. Earlier, Carlo Binda, a senior consultant with the NDP campaign and the creator of the cartoon, resigned.

Jewish leaders applauded Calvert's quick action, saying distribution of the cartoon is out of character for the Saskatchewan premier.

The cartoon was drawn as an illustration of the concern shared by many in the NDP that the Saskatchewan party has drawn up a list of bureaucrats it will dismiss should the party win the election Nov. 5.

"This is not a Calvert kind of deal," said June Avivi, chair of the Saskatchewan region of Canadian Jewish Congress and principal of Saskatoon's Hebrew school. "He is not that kind of man."

Susanne Kaplan, president of Saskatoon's Congregation Agudas Israel, added, "Lorne Calvert is not that kind of person. He would never condone that kind of thing."

News of the cartoon "upset a lot of us," Avivi said. "It derailed the usual campaigning for a period of time."

Community leaders are particularly concerned that "senior people on the campaign, strategy people, saw it and did not do anything about it."

"If anything, it reminded us of the fact… that the lessons of the Holocaust have not yet been learned, that it shouldn't be trivialized," Avivi said.

Kaplan said while the cartoon was in poor taste, "my analysis is that it is not anti-Semitic. The people behind the cartoon were identifying with Jews and making Hermanson the bad guy.

"It trivialized a serious evil."

Jeremy Parnes, director of services for the Beth Jacob Synagogue in Regina, agreed that anti-Semitism was not a motivating factor behind the drawing.

He was, however "concerned with the trivialization of the Holocaust in this context… I'm not sure it was meant to be an ethnic slur."

Parnes said it was symptomatic of the kind of negative campaigning that has become increasingly popular in recent years.

Harry Meyers, campaign chair of the Saskatchewan party, said the two firings were not enough. Meyers, who is Jewish, said more senior government officials should be held accountable for the cartoon.

In a telephone interview from Ottawa, Ron Singer, director of communications for Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "Cartoons like this diminish the true horror of the Holocaust. It is unwise to use the Holocaust as a metaphor – to compare it to any type of political situation."

Teen dance draws overflow crowd

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Staff at the Jewish Community Center of Greater Vancouver were overwhelmed last month when a dance for Jewish teens attracted as many as 1,500 people to a facility that could accommodate only 350.

"We know at least 400 of them were Jewish, but not a lot more than that," said Bryan Silverberg, director of the JCC's program services.

Lu Winters, the JCC's teen co-ordinator, had distributed 250 VIP passes to Jewish teenagers prior to the Sept. 20 dance and gave out another 100 tickets at the door. But as the numbers swelled, some people rushed the door and confused the head count, forcing her to speculate on the numbers inside. Many of the youths, some of whom had VIP passes, loitered outside, disgruntled, because the 350-person maximum regulated by fire safety rules had already been met and they weren't allowed in.

Last year's dance attracted 650 teens, and similar numbers were expected this year. But as news of the event circulated over the Internet and through fliers distributed to public high schools, the word spread. The problem was exacerbated when the DJ created and distributed promotional fliers that weren't approved by the JCC's staff. Instead of referring to the "Jewish Community Centre," they read "JCC," which was insufficiently specific, and thus attracted more than 1,000 non-Jewish teens.

But speaking after the event, Silverberg wasn't concerned.

"What went wrong here is that we ended up with too much success," he said. He added that there will be more dances in the future, with some changes. Tickets will be sold prior to the event at the JCC, and only to teens who are members of a new group, the Jewish Teens of Greater Vancouver. The group will give members discounts and will be restricted to those who can prove an affiliation with Jewish youth groups, synagogues, Jewish Family Services or the Jewish high school.

The centre is also in the process of forming an organizational committee for the next dance that will include parents, teenagers and community leaders. Future dances will have a Jewish theme, and will be held on dates that coincide with holidays such as Chanukah and Purim.

"We're not going to make the dances exclusive to Jews, but we are catering to our community, first and foremost," Silverberg said.

According to the Jewish Teen Initiative, only 20 per cent of Vancouver's Jewish teens are involved in Jewish programming. Usually, 220 teens participate annually in such events, which is why the sheer numbers took staffers by surprise last month.

"In one single night, we almost doubled the number of Jewish teens wanting to participate in a Jewish social activity," Silverberg wrote in a letter to the editor that appeared recently in the Jewish Western Bulletin. "We have learned that teens want dances, there is a way to accommodate them and we will be holding other Jewish teen dances in the future."

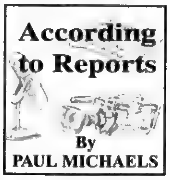
Questioning Israel's right to exist



According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

In her Oct. 4 Globe and Mail review of Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz's book The Case for Israel, Nomi Morris, a former Mideast bureau chief for Knight Ridder newspapers, wrote: "I'm not convinced Dershowitz or anyone else in the year 2003 need prove Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. It has been an internationally recognized fact for 55 years, which even the most vociferous European critics of Israel would acknowledge as a starting point. It is only fringe intellectuals and Muslim extremists who argue otherwise."

Unfortunately, this is not the case. Today, a growing chorus of mainstream liberal critics of Israel is indeed questioning Israel's very legitimacy as a Jewish state.

Even a few years ago – while the Oslo peace process was still alive – John Lloyd, a respected journalist and former editor of the New Statesman, wrote in the Globe and Mail that if Israel would give up its Zionist identity (that is, cease being a state of the Jewish people), it would help in the good fight against anti-Semitism.

Last year, Ted Honderich, a prominent Canadian-born British philosopher, wrote a book that – in one explosive chapter – defended Palestinian terrorism as morally justifiable. Honderich was featured on the CBC and in the Toronto Star. The depth of his antipathy toward Zionism was shown in his equally hideous assertion that justice would have been served had the Jews established a state in post-Holocaust Germany rather than in their ancestral homeland.

In the Oct. 23 New York Review of Books, Tony Judt, a professor of modern European studies at New York University, wrote that Israel is "dysfunctional," and as a Zionist state "is truly an anachronism" that is creating problems for Jews worldwide. Judt said it would be preferable for Israel to be transformed into a bi-national state (in which Jews would live as a minority among Palestinians between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River).

Some analysts say we can expect to see more such arguments from liberal thinkers, as views that were once considered extreme are becoming more mainstream.

Ironically, support for the separation fence between Israel and the Palestinians originally came from left-wing Israelis, who saw it as a way to preserve Israel as a Jewish and democratic state. Today, the fence is criticized as an "apartheid wall," another means of adding to the delegitimization of Israel.

Let us beware of this growing trend.

A rare and heated confrontation took place on Newsworld's Counterspin, Oct. 8, when Alan Dershowitz debated Tikkun editor Rabbi Michael Lerner.

In a show titled "Israel at the Crossroads," Dershowitz accused host Carol Off of failing to act as an impartial moderator: "I want to make one point about you: I think that the quotes you've used in the show have been absolutely one-sided and biased; you have only quoted critics of Israel, and I am simply not going to sit silently and accept your bias…"

A few minutes later when Dershowitz argued that there is evil in the world we must fight, Lerner replied: "Many of us thought that there have been evil forces in this country [the United States] as well."

Dershowitz, apparently spotting Off signalling her agreement with Lerner, said: "You can shake your head, Ms. Moderator, and show agreement [with Lerner], but let the [television] audience see whose side you're on."

Lerner: Are you saying I'm on the side of Hitler?

Dershowitz: No, I was talking about the moderator, who is not above criticism.

Bell's 'agenda' in Israel as Canadian ambassador hijacked by intifadah

But with the collapse of the Camp David summit in July 2000, the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising later that year and the dissolution of mutual trust, Bell's plans fell apart.

"Once the peace process broke down," he said in a recent interview, "we were dealing with the consequences of that."

As a result, Bell reverted to "an older agenda," the Arab-Israeli conflict, rather than focusing on the normal issues dealt with by embassies, such as trade and culture.

Bell, a personable man of 60, left Israel in mid-July.

He retired in August, after a distinguished 36-year career at the Department of Foreign Affairs. He then accepted a two-year position as a senior scholar at the Munk Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto.

"My wife and I ran out of patience with moving," he explained. "We wanted to put down roots, though we would have been happy to stay on in Israel."

Describing his new post as "a work in progress," Bell hopes to write scholarly articles and deliver timely speeches on Mideast affairs.

Last month, he was a keynote speaker at the University of Winnipeg and the University of Manitoba. Most recently, the House of Commons' foreign affairs committee invited him to speak on democracy in the Arab world

A graduate of the University of Windsor with an MA in political science, Bell was first secretary and consul at the Canadian embassy in Israel from 1975 to 1978. He served as ambassador to Jordan from 1987 to 1990 and as ambassador in Israel from 1990 to 1992. From 1994 until 1998, he was Canada's chief envoy in Egypt.

He was also director of the Department of Foreign Affairs' Middle East Relations Division.

When Bell – the only person who has ever been Canada's ambassador to Israel twice – went back to Tel Aviv four years ago, he found a relatively congenial political climate.

Israel and the Palestinians were deep in talks to resolve thorny final status issues, the Camp David negotiations lay ahead and the country had not been rocked by a suicide bombing in more than a year.

As he reflected on the past, he called the intifadah "a real setback." He thought it might be a passing phenomenon, but as the violence escalated, he quickly realized there was no returning to the status quo ante.

Bell, a stockbroker's son, arrived in Tel Aviv with the intention of solidifying Canada's commercial relations with Israel through seminars, trade delegations and investment.

But the intensification of the intifadah, and the precipitous decline of Israel's high-tech sector, had a chilling effect. Canadian investors, he said, were essentially scared off.

Nevertheless, Canada's volume of merchandise trade with Israel climbed by about 30 per cent. But in more important areas, ranging from investment to "product sharing," there was a standstill.

Cultural relations also suffered. "Interest just couldn't be sustained. Due to the intifadah, we couldn't get a full slate of people to come to Israel."

Bell's efforts to launch confidence-building programs between Israelis and Palestinians were frustrated by the continuing strife. But gradually, he started some two dozen projects on topics ranging from peacekeeping to health.

In his judgment, the breakdown of the Oslo process was a function of converging factors: Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's refusal to make tough decisions; the lack of support from his own constituency and from key Arab leaders; his fear of selling out his people; former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's inability to relate to the Palestinians; and former U.S. president Bill Clinton's propensity to push too hard and too fast.

Bell does not subscribe to the view that Arafat's goal is Israel's destruction. "There is an agreement out there he would sign on to," he said.

He was referring to the Clinton proposals of December 2000. They envisage an end-of-conflict accord in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza and a resolution of two key issues: the Palestinian refugee problem and eastern Jerusalem's status.

Bell – who considers himself both pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian – thinks Israel will eventually have to withdraw from the territories, give up the settlements and agree to a two-state solution.

Citing advances in weapons technology since the 1967 Six Day War, Bell said, "Retaining this bit of land or that bit of land is much less significant today."

Israel, he claimed, can exist within its pre-1967 borders "with more security than it has now."

Israel's retention of the West Bank and Gaza would ultimately render Jews a minority in their own state, he said, referring to high Arab birth rates.

To be a viable state, Israel must have "a solid Jewish majority."

Bell's wish for Israel is that it will be "a healthy, Zionist state" at peace with its Arab neighbours and enjoying full security. "That's the kind of Israel I would welcome."

Bell, however, doubts whether the "road map" peace plan, released last spring, can bring about peace any time soon.

"It's very, very hard to get back to Oslo when your kids are being blown up in cafés and buses." As for the Palestinians, their lives are circumscribed by a web of restrictive checkpoints, he said.

Still, Bell remains confident the Oslo accords, plus Clinton's plan, can form the basis of an eventual settlement.

Asked to tick off the highlights of his ambassadorship, Bell listed the joys of writing reports about the political situation in Israel and his friendships and stimulating conversations with Israelis.

He also cited Israel's intellectual vibrancy and his success in influencing Canadian policy. As he tells it, he played a role in convincing Ottawa to declare Hezbollah a terrorist group.

Speaking of one last highlight, he said, "I wanted Canadian Jewish groups to feel the Canadian embassy was there for them. By and large, I think I succeeded. We enjoyed a pretty good relationship, despite some policy differences."

He described Canada's bilateral relations with Israel as "pretty good," saying that decision-makers in Israel's foreign affairs ministry and the prime minister's office would agree with this assessment.

He and his wife, who lived in a villa in the upscale Tel Aviv suburb of Savyon, enjoyed Tel Aviv's vibrancy and Jerusalem's spirituality and historical ambience.

Israel's rich cultural life also impressed them. They visited museums, attended concerts and poked around archeological ruins, often in the company of an Israeli friend.

During his last posting in Tel Aviv, Bell said, he identified more with Israel than ever before, probably because he was no longer responsible for Palestinian affairs.

Parliamentarians concerned about missing Israelis

OTTAWA — Eight members of Parliament and three senators have written Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham to express their "deep concern" over the fate of Israelis missing in Lebanon.

The Oct. 6 letter says the parliamentarians "unequivocally condemn the terrorist campaign of the Hezbollah organization based in southern Lebanon against Israel, including the kidnapping of Israeli citizens. We are alarmed that the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has been denied access to the missing Israeli citizens by Syria, Lebanon and the Hezbollah, despite continuous requests."

The Israelis in questions are:

- Elchanan Tannenbaum (an Israeli businessman kidnapped by Hezbollah Oct. 16, 2000 in Brussels, Belgium and believed held in Lebanon).
- Sgt. Adi Avitan (abducted by Hezbollah Oct. 7, 2000 in Israel and believed held in southern Lebanon).
- Staff-Sgt. Benny Avraham (abducted by Hezbollah Oct. 7, 2000 in Israel and believed held in southern Lebanon).
- Staff-Sgt. Omar Souad (abducted by Hezbollah Oct. 7, 2000 in Israel and believed held in southern Lebanon).
- Capt. Ron Arad (captured by the Shiite group Amal Oct. 16, 1986, and traded to the Hezbollah in southern Lebanon; afterwards he was reportedly sold to the Iranian Revolutionary Guard).
- Sgt. Tzvi Feldman (taken Prisoner of War in the June 11, 1982 battle of Sultan Ya'qub in the Beq'a Valley in eastern Lebanon).
- Corporal Yehudah Katz (taken Prisoner of War in the June 11, 1982 battle of Sultan Ya'qub in the Beq'a Valley in eastern Lebanon).
- and Sgt. Zachary Baumel (taken Prisoner of War in the June 11, 1982 battle of Sultan Ya'qub in the Beq'a Valley in eastern Lebanon).

The MPs and senators say they are "mindful of the responsibility that the occupying Syrian military forces bear for the fate and well-being of individuals held or/and lost within the Syrian area of influence in Lebanon.

"We are aware of the proxy role that the terrorist group Hezbollah plays for Syria, which has trained, funded and supported this organization on Syrian and Lebanese soil since the organization's inception and which holds many pressure points over Hezbollah's ability to conduct terrorist activities and operate.

"We join the Canadian government in welcoming the unilateral, May 23, 2000 withdrawal of Israeli military forces from southern Lebanon in accordance with the requirements of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 425 (1978). But we are cognizant that Syria is aware of the fate of the missing Israeli citizens and holds the power to their release (if alive) and to the return of their remains (if deceased) to their grieving families."

The MPs and senators call on Graham and the government of Canada "to forcefully raise the fate of the missing Israeli citizens with the Syrian and the Lebanese governments at every opportunity and insist on their release, as well as the return of their remains to Israel.

"We encourage the government of Canada to strongly urge countries capable of influencing Syria to put pressure on Damascus to release all information as to the whereabouts of the surviving Israeli captives and return the remains of those who have died to their families.

"Additionally, we request that the government of Canada encourage the German mediation efforts between the Hezbollah and Israel on the question of missing Israeli citizens. Finally, we suggest to the Canadian government to offer to facilitate the return of missing Israeli citizens as an important, goodwill gesture of peaceful intentions on the part of the Syrian government."

The letter is signed by the following MPs: Carolyn Bennett, Irwin Cotler, Art Eggleton, Marlene Jennings, Anita Neville, Jim Peterson, Joe Volpe and Raymonde Folco, and the following senators: Leo Kolber, Richard Kroft and Jerry Grafstein.

Malaysia PM condemned for saying 'Jews rule world'

Calling on world leaders to respond, Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister for Jerusalem and diaspora affairs, condemned "the outrageous anti-Semitic remarks," saying they marked "the first time since World War II that anti-Semitism in its most primitive and vulgar form constitutes the official agenda of a respected international political forum." -

Sharansky said the comments were made possible by "the indifference and lack of concern demonstrated by the western world when confronted by blatant anti-Semitism. We all know how these things begin – always with Jews – but history has taught us again and again that it never ends with the Jews."

Mahathir Mohamad

In Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress President Keith Landy called Mahathir's comments "deeply troubling," while B'nai Brith Canada President Rochelle Wilner called them "hateful."

In later remarks to reporters, Mahathir himself was unapologetic, saying that while people think "it is proper to criticize Muslims and Arabs, it is not proper to criticize Europeans and Jews."

Yet, as outrage poured in from the United States and Europe, Malaysia last week defended Mahathir's comments, but apologized for any misunderstandings or offence they caused.

Malaysian Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar, struggling to contain the controversy, said the remarks were taken out of context in a speech mainly about empowering Muslims to be stronger, nonviolent actors on the world stage.

Repeated assertions of Jewish dominance dotted the speech to buttress Mahathir's analysis that Muslims needed to embrace modern knowledge and technology and overcome divisions over religious dogma that have left them weakened on the world stage.

"Islam has never advocated being anti-anybody, including the Jews," Syed Hamid told reporters. "The only problem with the Jews is when the State of Israel was created," he said, adding that Jews work in Malaysia and are welcome there.

Mahathir, a respected leader in the developing world with a long history of making articulate, provocative comments, told the leaders that Muslims had achieved "nothing" in more than 50 years of fighting Israel.

"[Jews] survived 2,000 years of pogroms not by hitting back but by thinking," Mahathir said.

Mahathir said the world's "1.3 billion Muslims cannot be defeated by a few million Jews," but suggested the use of political and economic tactics, not violence, to achieve a "final victory."

"In today's world, we wield a lot of political, economic and financial clout, enough to make up for our weaknesses in military terms," Mahathir said.

The speech drew a standing ovation from the leaders, who included Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Abdullah, Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf and Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnoputri.

Russian President Vladimir Putin and Philippines President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo were special guests because of their large Muslim minorities.

Many focused more on the aspects of the speech that Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Maher called "a good road map" to Muslim empowerment.

"This was a pep talk to the Muslim countries for them to work hard and look to the future," Maher said. "But as soon as you have any criticism of Israel, then there are people who are very eager to rush to condemnation, without comprehending what it's all about."

Karzai, asked whether he thought the speech was anti-Semitic, said: "No, I don't think so. Dr. Mahathir spoke of the inhibitions within the Islamic world and that those inhibitions must go away, and I entirely agree with that."

"I don't think [the comments] were anti-Semitic at all," said Yemen's foreign minister, Abubakar al-Qirbi. "I think he was basically stating the fact to the Muslim world."

It wasn't seen that way in Washington or Europe. U.S. State Department spokesperson Adam Ereli called the remarks offensive and inflammatory. "We view them with the contempt and derision they deserve," he said.

The leaders of the European Union, meeting in Brussels, planned to adopt a statement saying the EU "deeply deplores" Mahathir's words, Italian Foreign Minister Franco Frattini said.

"The prime minister used expressions that were gravely offensive, very strongly anti-Semitic and… strongly counter to principles of tolerance, dialogue and understanding between the Western world and the Islamic world," he said.

Germany's foreign ministry called the comments "totally unacceptable" and said it called in Malaysia's charge d'affaires in Berlin to protest. "It was made clear to [him] that repeating such prejudices and combining them with the tragic chapter of European and German history, the Holocaust, is irresponsible," the ministry said in a statement.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, blasted Mahatir as an "dangerous racist whose hateful rhetoric is a virtual invitation for further anti-Semitic attacks."

Iranian President Mohammad Khatami addresses the Islamic Conference. [RNS/Reuters photos]

"Is this the best a so-called moderate Muslim leader can do to inspire his co-religionists – by slandering the Jewish people and the State of Israel with false stereotypes that have led to genocide and terrorism in the past?" he asked.

Malaysia is one of the world's most successful Muslim countries, and its high-tech economic development and religious tolerance have made it admired in the developing world and held up by Washington as a model Islamic country. Mahathir has also locked up terror suspects without qualms.

The Malay Muslim ethnic majority generally lives peacefully alongside large, non-Muslim ethnic Chinese and Indian minorities. Islam is the official religion, but freedom of worship is part of state policy. But an Islamic fundamentalist opposition party has made gains in recent years against Mahathir's ruling coalition.

Temple Mount more important than peace

The following is an essay written by MK Natan Sharansky in response to the "Geneva accord" that was drawn up Oct. 12 by former Israeli and Palestinian government officials. The private proposal would see a Palestinian state encompassing 98 per cent of the West Bank, all the Gaza Strip and Arab neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, and would give some four million refugees and their descendants the option to settle in a future Palestinian state or third countries, or be compensated for remaining where they are. Some could go to Israel, but only if Israel agreed to take them.

By NATAN SHARANSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Since the existence of the Geneva initiative was publicly announced last Sunday, there has been much criticism of the process that led to the agreement. Once again, the same gang of Oslo blazers, a gang not even elected by the Israeli public, who instead denounced it and kicked it out of government and centres of influence for its "amazing successes" of the past. Once more, the same gang is conducting negotiations on its own and committing Israel to far-reaching and irresponsible concessions.

Criticism of the process, although it is correct and justified, is diverting attention from the central and more important contents of the agreement – and primarily from the relinquishing of Jerusalem.

Natan Sharansky

I remember a discussion in the Barak government, even before Camp David, in which [then-justice minister] Yossi Beilin tried to convince us that if we would only reach "some kind of agreement" on the Temple Mount, and give Palestinians the Christian Quarter of the Old City as well, the longed-for peace would come.

I asked, why the Christian Quarter? What connection do the Palestinians have to the Christian Quarter? Beilin looked at me in surprise and said, what do you care? That's the Christians' problem. We'll achieve peace and let the Christian world worry about freedom of religion and access to its holy places.

At the time, I thought that this was a matter of disdain for the values of other nations and cultures. Beilin didn't mind sacrificing Israel's relations with the Christian world and risking the access of millions of Christians to places that are the cradle of their religion, so long as we could achieve the longed-for peace. (That assumed the Palestinians would respect religious freedom the way they respect other human rights.)

Today, after Camp David, Taba, and now the relinquishing of Temple Mount in the framework of the Geneva accord, I understand that Beilin's gang are not necessarily contemptuous of the values of other nations, they are contemptuous of all values. Of all, except one, that is – peace.

This gang seems to have forgotten, or hasn't yet understood, that as much as we long and hope for peace, it is not a value that stands by itself. It is an essential condition for the existence of a country that wishes to live, but it isn't the goal. It was not for the sake of peace that the State of Israel was established, and it was not because of peace that millions of Jews gathered here.

Nor was it peace for which the Jewish people prayed for thousands of years. The Jewish people prayed for Jerusalem. Because of Jerusalem, the Jewish people returned to Israel from the four corners of the earth. For it, they were willing to make all the necessary sacrifices, for that same dream of a thousand generations – "next year in rebuilt Jerusalem."

It should be noted that if we totally relinquish every value for the sake of peace, we won't have peace, either. Just as in the past, this time, too, the Palestinians will interpret such a relinquishing of what constitutes our very identity as a tremendous weakness that calls for war.

The values symbolized by Jerusalem are not only religious in nature. One doesn't have to be religious to understand that without our historical connection to Jerusalem, without the link to the past, without the feeling of continuity with the ancient kingdoms of Israel for whom the Temple Mount was the centre of existence, we really are foreign invaders and colonialists in this country.

One doesn't have to be religious in order to understand that relinquishing the Temple Mount is a justification of the Palestinian argument: you have no right to exist in this country, you have no connection to it, get out of here. One doesn't have to be religious in order to understand that relinquishing the Temple Mount is not only relinquishing the past, it is primarily relinquishing the future. The future of all of us, here.

The members of the Hovevei Zion Zionist movement were not religious – they were secular socialists who considered religion a degenerate and sick product of the exile. Despite that, they fought with all their might against the Uganda Plan [a 1903 British offer to let the Jews build a homeland in Uganda]. It was clear to them that without a common past, without roots, the Zionist project had no chance of succeeding.

Even today, we must understand that without Jerusalem and without our historical roots, the Zionist project will not be able to survive. Without Jerusalem, Israel will become just another Jewish community, one of many in the world, like that of New York, London or Toronto – except more dangerous, less wealthy and less comfortable. It will not be the centre of the Jewish world, not the focus of its existence – just one more community. And if that's the case, why continue to live in it? For what? In the name of what?

Natan Sharansky is Minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 13

- The Israel Defence Forces ended its weekend sweep into Rafah aimed at uncovering tunnels used to smuggle weapons from Egypt into Gaza. Eight Palestinians were killed in the operation, which UN officials said left more than 1,200 Palestinians homeless. The raid was mounted after reports Palestinian groups were trying to smuggle anti-aircraft missiles into Gaza. (The IDF temporarily re-entered the camp the next day.)

Oct. 14

- Libya is trying to acquire nuclear capabilities from North Korea and Pakistan, according to Israeli officials. The source added that Libya is believed to be seeking the know-how to build its own reactor, rather than a ready-made device.

Oct. 15

- Three Americans were killed when their convoy was bombed in the Gaza Strip. (Palestinian police subsequently arrested several members of the Popular Resistance Committee.)

Oct. 16

- The death toll in the bombing of Haifa's Maxim restaurant rose to 21, with the death of George Matar, a father of five whose nephew is one of the owners of the restaurant.

Oct. 17

- A mosque, a church and a new synagogue will be built in the new terminal at Ben-Gurion International Airport as part of the Ben-Gurion 2000 project, due to open next summer.

Haifa mayor remains optimistic despite terror

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

Even after the Oct. 4 suicide bombing in Haifa, one of the bloodiest terror attacks to strike the city in the last three years, the new mayor remains defiantly optimistic about the future, an optimism he says he shares with many of the city's Arab and Jewish residents.

"Haifa is still the safest place in Israel," says Yona Yahav, who was elected to office just over three months ago.

In a recent telephone interview, the Haifa-born mayor revealed a deep understanding of, and respect for, the relationship between Arabs and Jews in this picturesque northern port city, the kind of relationship, he said, that can't be destroyed by a suicide bomber.

Yona Yahav

"I knew her [the bomber's] real target was the unique coexistence that we treasure so much in Haifa," Yahav said. "That's why she geared her attack at the restaurant, an important symbol of this coexistence."

The attack was carried out by Hanad Jaradat, 29, a lawyer-in-training from the West Bank city of Jenin, in revenge for the killing of her brother and a cousin, both members of Islamic Jihad, by the Israel Defence Forces last June. Fifteen Jews died in the bombing along with four Arabs. Three of the dead were children and five victims came from one family.

According to Yahav, the April 2002 attack on the Matza restaurant, the March 2003 attack on Bus 37 in the Moriah neighbourhood and the bombing of Maxim's restaurant were unique to Haifa in that they struck middle-class neighbourhoods where people believe terror doesn't strike. In Haifa, just under 30,000 Arabs live side by side with some 275,000 Jews.

The Maxim restaurant had been around for 40 years and was owned by a second generation of Arab and Jewish partners. The Taiyar family had joined forces with two Christian Arabs, Salim Matar and Abu Sharbal, turning the beachfront restaurant into a popular hangout for both Arabs and Jews from all backgrounds.

"The customers are mixed and it is the symbol of the city itself," said Yahav. "The owners promised me that there is nothing that will destroy the good relationship and longstanding partnership that prevails amidst all this violence.

"Immediately following the attack all the Arab leaders came to see us and pay condolences," the mayor said. "Palestinian Prime Minister Abu Allah called right after the explosion, saying that he felt it was geared against him personally because he wanted to establish a new dialogue. He himself had been a regular patron of Maxim's."

The dialogue the prime minister referred to includes plans to improve Arab schools and access for Arab students to Haifa's world-renowned Technion institute.

"Our aim is to enhance the standard of living for our Arab residents through a full scale upgrade of schools and a dramatic infrastructure improvement program," Yahav said.

In the days following the attack, the mayor went to every funeral and house of mourning of both Arabs and Jews. Through their tears, the Arab mourners asked Yahav and other like-minded politicians to speak out and ask leaders on both sides of the conflict to stop the bloodshed. Yahav responded by sending a message through the media for Haifa's citizens "to remain calm and show restraint."

If indeed the road map peace plan is embarked upon full-heartedly, Yahav hopes his city's example will serve as inspiration for success.

"We are determined to show everyone that if peace is the goal, nothing should get in the way," he said.

Weekend of violence

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Air Force launched three air strikes in Gaza City in the space of several hours Monday, killing two members of the Hamas military wing and, according to some reports, a passerby. The raids destroyed a missile factory and a weapons store.

The Israeli Air Force went into action a day after eight Qassam missiles fired from Gaza Strip struck in and near the Negev town of Sderot.

There were conflicting reports of the number of wounded in the Israelis' air strike, ranging as high as 23.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia condemned the strikes, saying they made it harder for Israel and the Palestinians to hold talks on ending violence.

"These Israeli acts do not help ceasefire talks, they discourage them," he said.

Ra'anan Gissin, an advisor to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said the strikes were part of Israel's war on terrorism.

"We will chase the terrorists everywhere," he said. "They will have no sanctuary."

The strikes came the day after after three IDF soldiers were killed and another was wounded in a shooting ambush near Ramallah.

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a militant offshoot of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, took responsibility for killing the three soldiers Sunday evening in a shooting attack on a military patrol close to Road 60, near Ofra and the Arab village of Ein Yabrud.

A fourth soldier suffered moderate-to-serious wounds in the attack.

The IDF continued Monday morning to search for the gunmen. Following the attack, IDF soldiers placed the village of Ein Yabrud under closure and set up roadblocks at all the main traffic arteries in and out of the area.

The three soldiers killed were identified as Sgt. Elad Pollak, 19, from Kiryat Motzkin; Sgt. Ro'i Yaakov Solomon, 21, from Tel Aviv, and Staff Sergeant Erez Idan, 20, from Rishon Letzion.

A question for Batsheva's choreographer/ director

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Ohad Naharin, I have a question.

After seeing Naharin's Virus, a Batsheva Dance Company performance you directed and choreographed, I was thrilled that you agreed to an interview. Unfortunately, you went back to Israel and, with the time difference, we haven't been able to connect.

I would have told you how much I enjoyed your adaptation of Peter Handke's play Offending the Audience. Your 70-minute work, performed without intermission, opened the Harbourfront Centre's dance season last week, bolstering the international reputation of the Batsheva Dance Company, an Israeli troupe founded in 1964.

Under the watchful eyes of security guards positioned in the corners of the theatre, boundaries were blurred between audience and performers. You clearly intended that nothing be left to our imagination, as your narrator explained, so that your message could spread like a virus.

In fact, the word Plastelina, the Hebrew name for a clay children use to mould impressions, was written across the wall at the back of the stage to further emphasize your desire to shape our thoughts.

But you must have also meant the audience to be drawn into the Palestine-Israel debate. The production integrated the power of 16 skilled dancers with personal Hebrew narratives and Middle Eastern melodies using Habib Ala Jamal's Arabic lyrics that called for "our children to come back to their homeland." The work evoked a profound emotional response to a complex political situation.

The dancers' sharp, brisk movements were juxtaposed with a fluid style so that the audience was effortlessly drawn into a portrayal of despair and struggle. By breaking down barriers between audience and dancers, between them and us, between you and me, Naharin's Virus presented individual suffering and conflict, and the universal condition could be felt through the Palestinian Arab experience.

I understand why you did this. The play was developed soon after rioting broke out in Israel in October 2000. Thirteen Israeli Arabs were killed by riot police during that heated time. Reviewers have suggested that you intended this play to bring the two peoples together, to show that Israelis understand Palestinian suffering and national aspirations, to prove, as Handke suggests that "we won't pretend that you don't exist."

Since the founding of the Batsheva Dance Company, the troupe has often found itself leading Israeli sensibilities through innovative emotional experiences. Over the years, the dance company has taken on issues of censorship and Orthodoxy with pieces that confront religious and political sensitivities.

Five years ago, you resigned from the company when the Prime Minister's Office pressed to have your dancers appear in long underwear because their costumes – undershirts and shorts – were too revealing. Your protest was successful and you returned.

It is now three years since this production began. And indeed, Ohad, the Palestinian narrative is compelling and sympathetic. However, since Naharin's Virus was first perfomed, more than 3,000 Israelis and Palestinians have died in ongoing violence, and there doesn't seem to be a glimmer of hope in sight.

If we had spoken, I would have asked you one question.

Ohad, I have seen artisitic expressions describing the plight of the Palestinians. Have you seen even one theatrical production portraying the suffering of the Israelis?

The Batsheva Dance Company performed recently at Harbourfront.

Idan Raichel dubbed 'Israeli music's great hope'

By VIVA PRESS

Reporting on the Israeli music scene.

The Idan Raichel Project – Helicon: Once you slide this album into your stereo, it will be difficult to remove. The music is original and addictive.

Idan Raichel, the 25-year-old behind the music, combines poetry, electronic beats, classical scores and Ethiopian tunes into a unique harmonious mix. Singles from the album including Boee and Im Tilech are constants on the Israeli airwaves.

Raichel is not celebrated for his low voice – he sings just one song on the album, Hinech Yafa – but rather for his masterful musical arrangements. He employs a handful of others to sing the words he has composed – hence the album being termed a project.

Israeli singer Din Din Aviv's vocals are entrancing – her rendition of Talking Quietly is especially spellbinding.

Raichel, who sports dreadlocks, recently netted Israeli TV' s performer of the year award and was pegged by the national newspaper, Yediot Aharanot, as "Israeli music's great hope."

Considering mainstream music fans and radio stations hardly ever sway from the set genres of pop, soft rock, and folk, the public's embracing of The Idan Raichel Project has been wondrous. The album went gold in its first three months when it sold more than 25,000 units; and to date has sold more than 80,000 copies. It's as good as everyone says it is.

Ahava Be'shnaim (Love in Two) – NMC: Record label NMC sifted through the hundreds of Israeli love songs available, and has chosen the 28 best for its latest collection, Ahava Be'shnaim.

The double-disc album is further divided into a disc "for her" (called Waiting for Him) and a disc "for him" (titled My Pretty One). The discs offer different genres of Israeli music including rock, pop, and oriental.

"Her" disc, of women singing songs to men, features songs by Dana Berger (rock), Nurit Galron (classical), Korin Allal (pop), Leah Shabat (folk), and Zehava Ben (oriental) among others. "His" disc (men singing to women) is also diverse in its lineup and includes Mosh Ben-Ari (alternative), Arik Sinai (oldies), Evyatar Banai (rock), and Yitzhak Klepter (blues). The album is a sweet assortment of songs, but nothing exceptional.

The cover of The Idan Raichel Project.

Shirim Me'Lev Haolam (Songs from the Heart of the World) – NMC: Celebrating seven years in business, the world-music band, Sheva, and its label Lev Haolam, recently put out a collection of 13 songs from the 10 CDs it has released.

The septet, comprising both Jewish and Arab musicians, provides a mix of Middle Eastern and Indian sounds with spiritual texts. Combining guitars, harmonium, African djambe, ney, vocals, Persian santoor, drums, and darbuka – plus an array of other instruments – each song is an inspiring original.

Bopping one's head to this multi-cultural music is inevitable. Standout tracks include numbers six and ten. Track six offers up a new hippy version of Israeli rock great Arik Einstein's Song No.8. Track 10, Keshet, triumphantly layers text from Psalms with whistles, darbukas and Arab horns.

The Sheva ensemble performs the bulk of the songs, while ethnic artists Mosh Ben-Ari, Zafa, Nanaja, Merkava, and Avishai Bar Natan – who signed with the Lev Haolam label – individually contribute to the album.

Overall, the mystical-spiritual music on this album is pulsing. Music can be bought at: http://www.israel-music.com (English site); www.mitos.co.il (Hebrew site); www.nmc-music.co.il (Hebrew and English site) or at Israel-oriented stores.

Tribal moves to Vaughan

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Tribal Productions, run by co-artistic directors Eli Lukawitz and Samuel Rosenthal, is the new resident theatre company of the Vaughan City Playhouse.

"We have made one of the biggest transitions of our careers and certainly in the career of Tribal," says Lukawitz.

Since 1994, Tribal was based at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts.

"A great opportunity came up to become the new resident company of the Vaughan City Playhouse," Lukawitz says. "It is a wonderful 381 seat theatre with a beautiful large stage."

But the best part about the venue, she says, is that its new management, Theatre Connections run by Sherri Dayton and Jessica Dargo Caplin and the city itself, is "very interested in fostering a new community venue that presents professional theatre.

"They say Vaughan is one of the fastest growing communities in Canada and there is a huge community that surrounds the playhouse that might be interested to know that they don't have to drive downtown to see high quality professional theatre," says Lukawitz.

"That for us is going to be the challenge, to let people know that. Our subscribers have been our lifeblood for the last five years. We sent out correspondence to them and said the reasons why it is going to be better at the Vaughan City Playhouse is because there is fixed-numbered seating and free parking. That was a big one. I can't tell you how happy people were to hear there is ample free parking at the playhouse."

Actor Partner Rosenthal, whose stage name is Sam Owen, has appeared in Tribal's past productions of Office Hours, Prelude to a Kiss, Jake's Women, Puppetmaster of Lodz, Death of a Salesman and The Diary of Anne Frank and will be onstage this year as well.

This season, Tribal Productions is offering three well-known plays. Running to Nov. 9 is the Off-Broadway musical I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change, starring George Masswohl, who was recently nominated for a Dora Award, Marlene Handrahan, Michelle Piller and Rosenthal.

Noel Coward's Private Lives will run from Feb. 4 to Feb. 22, and the season ends with the Tennessee Williams classic The Glass Menagerie, from April 21 to May 9.

Lukawitz says Tribal Productions is deliberately putting on plays with recognizable titles.

"We want to appeal to as large a group as possible. It is going to be important at the playhouse to have shows that are accessible that people have seen or want to see."

Thornhill's Vaughan City Playhouse is located at 1000 New Westminster Dr. For tickets and subscription information, call 905-882-SHOW.

Russian on tour

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Internationally acclaimed Russian conductor and solo violinist Vladimir Spivakov, founder of the Moscow Virtuosi, is on a North American tour with the orchestra.

He will present his only Canadian concert in Toronto, Sunday, Oct. 26, at the Metro Convention Centre, John Basset Theatre, 255 Front St., at 8 p.m.

The 30-piece orchestra last appeared at a sold-out concert in Canada 10 years ago. The Toronto program will include selections by Bach, Mozart and Tchaikovsky.

Spivakov, who was a student of Yuri Yankelevich at the Moscow conservatory, was the winner of the International Tchaikovsky Competition and the Paganini International Violin Competition. Since 1999, he has been music director and principal conductor of the Russian National Orchestra.

He made his North American debut with the New York Philharmonic in 1975, and has made solo appearances with many world prominent orchestras, including those in San Francisco, Cleveland and Philadelphia, as well as in England, France and Russia.

He launched his conducting career in 1979 with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the Ravinia Festival and has appeared as guest conductor in Rome, London, Scotland and the Netherlands.

In addition to his performances throughout the world, Spivakov has made more than 20 recordings of works by masters including Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Shostakovich. He also recorded concertos by Brahms and Tchaikovsky with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra and an album of works by Gershwin, Ravel and Debussy.

The musician has been decorated with Russia's highest prize, the National Cultural Heritage Award and is ambassador of the World Economic Forum in Davos Switzerland.

In 1994, Spivakov established the International Charity Foundation, which offers support to talented young people and needy children from his homeland.

For more information or tickets for the Oct. 26 concert, call 416-780-9319 or 416-482-6304.

The Travellers honour Woody Guthrie on Oct. 30.

Special concert by The Travellers to honour legend Woody Guthrie

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

"From the Arctic Circle/ To the Great Lakes waters,/ This land was made for you and me."

Folk music veterans The Travellers will perform that classic snippet from the Canadian version of This Land Is Your Land on Oct. 30 at the Leah Posluns Theatre, as part of their tribute to eminent 1940s-era singer Woody Guthrie.

Guthrie penned the original version of the song in 1940.

The Koffler School of Music at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Mariposa Folk Festival have partnered to host the event, one of four concerts the two organizations will stage at Leah Posluns.

When Koffler director Adrienne Cohen first heard that Mariposa – an annual Ontario folk music festival – might be touring the Canadian folk group The Travellers, she reacted instinctively.

"The Travellers have a great reputation in the city, in the country," she says. "Many people grew up with their music, and even kids listened to their children's music recordings."

In 1950s Toronto, The Travellers, as youths, met at Camp Naivelt, a United Jewish People's Order youth camp. Since Guthrie's anti-establishment tunes were blacklisted, the group decided to compose their own version of This Land Is Your Land, which became a rallying cry and patriotic anthem.

The group regularly played for union and labour audiences, and they insisted on singing Yiddish songs during a tour in the former Soviet Union.

The Travellers were the first musicians signed by Columbia Records of Canada, and they headlined the first Canada Day concert on Parliament Hill in 1962. The group members have changed, but The Travellers have been performing for 50 years.

Jerry Gray, the only original member of the group, says the upcoming concert will focus on Guthrie's impact on the political and musical landscape.

"He was a man of his time and before his time," Gray says.

Guthrie's messages are still relevant today, he adds, because "he rallied for peace and harmony."

The concert will feature a chronological trip through Guthrie's life, from his Oklahoma upbringing to his train-hopping trips. Because of the Jewish connection with the Koffler School of Music, The Travellers will perform one of Guthrie's least-known works, Happy Chanokey.

Gray says a narration about Guthrie's life will tie the songs together. Vignettes include details of the singer's anti-Hitler tunes and his battle with Huntington's Chorea, a neurological disorder. And Guthrie's American version of This Land Is Your Land will also be honoured with a hearty performance.

The Travellers consist of Gray, Joe Hampton, Ted Roberts, Don Vickery and Aileen Ahern.

"[The Travellers] always reminded me of camp," Cohen says. "It's feel-good sing-along bonfire music." She adds that community reaction has been ecstatic and ticket-buyers range from nostalgic seniors to curious 20-somethings.

The concert also marks an evolution for the Koffler school, which has focused on a classical and Israeli repertoire. Cohen says she wants to "bring in more diverse music that will attract various audiences." The next concert after The Travellers will be a Chanukah show on Dec. 11 featuring Israeli folk performers Mattan Klein & Seeds of Sun.

Attendance at the Koffler concerts has risen 10 per cent, Cohen estimates, and she is hopeful the new partnership with Mariposa will attract folk music fans across the city.

"The Travellers are universally revered across the country," she says.

And Gray speaks frankly about Guthrie's appeal. "His songs were not great works of art, but he created visual images that stuck in people's minds."

The Travellers perform Oct. 30 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $30 in advance and $35 at the door. Call 416-636-1880, ext. 228.

Names in the News: Professional headhunter Herbert Hess, proprietor of the Toronto recruiting firm Hess Associates, has himself been recruited as a chorus member in Royal Opera Canada's fully staged production of Bizet's Carmen, which opened last week at the Toronto Centre for the Arts in North York.

A longtime opera buff, Hess is thrilled to be one of 40 choristers and one of only four baritones in the production, in which he plays a soldier and townsperson. "Carmen is the world's greatest opera," he enthuses. It's the first of four ROC productions this season in which he expects to sing. French mezzo-soprano Sylvie Brunet stars as Carmen. 416-322-0456.

Research program geared to help people with angina

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A research project to determine if psycho-education in a group setting can help people with angina deal with their chronic pain is looking for volunteers.

The study, called the Chronic Angina Self-Management Program, is being carried out by Michael McGillian, a registered nurse with experience in emergency medicine and a PhD candidate at the University of Toronto faculty of nursing, and by nursing faculty member Judy Watt-Watson.

McGillian said he became interested in the topic when he realized that many patients with angina make repeated visits to the emergency room.

Angina, he explained, is pain induced by a transient lack of oxygen to the heart, caused by coronary artery disease. It is a chronic condition, with pain appearing during activity and/or at rest, depending on the severity of the disease.

The pain can occur several times a day, or once or twice a month, he said, depending on the state of heart health, the percentage of blockage to the arteries and other risk factors, such as diet, smoking or stress.

People worry particularly, McGillion said, "because the question arises, 'Am I having a heart attack or another heart attack or just a temporary lack of oxygen.'"

While different sources of nitroglycerine, in tablets, patches or a sublingual spray, can help, there is a gap, he said, in helping patients manage their condition on a daily basis.

The program McGillion has created is an adaptation of a chronic disease self-management program developed by Kate Lorig and her colleagues at the Stanford Patient Education Research Center, which is part of the Stanford University School of Medicine in Palo Alto, Calif.

The model was also adapted by Marjorie Hammond of the U of T faculty of nursing recently, to help those suffering from arthritis.

McGillion conducted a pilot study at St. Michael's Hospital in 2001.

"I interviewed both patients and clinicians to find out what they needed to learn to help them manage their angina pain."

Participants will be randomly divided into two groups. One will enter the program immediately, while the other will enter in three months.

The program will be held at 203 College St., a building on the St. George campus of the U of T with elevator access. It will last for six weeks, two hours a week, and McGillion hopes each group will have about 15 participants.

The sessions will follow "the standardized psycho-educational format, designed to improve angina patients' health-related quality of life, by increasing their capacity to manage their angina on a day to day basis," McGillion said.

Topics to be covered include an explanation of what angina is; management strategies, such as relaxation and medication; exacerbating factors, including emotional upheaval, sleep deprivation and fatigue; and learning when to seek emergency help.

People are eligible to participate if they have heart disease, have had an angina attack within the last six months and have not had a heart attack within the last six months. There is no charge.

McGillion hopes to begin the first group in November. For more information or to participate, call him at 416-946-5799.

Stress study seeking children of survivors, their parents

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York is seeking the children of Montreal Holocaust survivors – and their parents, if possible – for the first Holocaust study funded by the U.S.-based National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH).

According to psychologist Rachel Goodman Aspler, the five-year study, which began a year ago, is trying to answer two main questions:

Are the children of Holocaust survivors more likely to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and/or depression? And if they are more likely, is there a biological or genetic marker?

Aspler, a 31-year-old native of Toronto who moved to Montreal recently with her family from New York City, said Montreal's Jewish community is an ideal place to recruit subjects because of its high proportion of survivors.

Aspler herself is the daughter of a survivor, teacher Sylvia Goodman of Toronto, who was hidden as a toddler in Belgium for $2\frac{1}{2}$ years.

The study is being overseen by Dr. Rachel Yehuda, the director of Mount Sinai's stress studies department, who has conducted several studies in the last decade on Holocaust survivors and their families.

Yehuda hopes to recruit close to 500 subjects – children of survivors aged 25-55, their parents "if they are able and willing" and non-survivor "control" subjects.

Besides Montreal, the other cities participating so far are New York and Cleveland.

Aspler, who worked as an associate clinical professor at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine's stress studies program, said, "These are fascinating questions we are trying to answer.

"Why does this person develop PTSD while another does not? What are the risk factors?"

In simple terms, Aspler said, the study is trying to look at the "biology of stress."

It is known, for example, that the endocrine system produces stress hormones when people are confronted by extreme trauma, as in the "fight-or-flight" syndrome. In that situation, the body produces a high level of the stress hormone cortisol to contain the stress once its cause is gone.

But Yehuda's research suggests that people who get PTSD actually have a low level of cortisol, which makes them unable to control their stress.

Moreover, Aspler said, recent studies by Yehuda and others in the field "have raised the possibility that low cortisol levels may be a risk factor for PTSD, rather than a consequence."

Aspler said low cortisol levels in the adult children of Holocaust survivors "have been shown to be specifically associated with the risk factor of parental PTSD."

One possible benefit of the study, Aspler said, is that science will be able "to evaluate the health risks associated with prenatal and postnatal stress. And in the absence of good family history data, it is important for offspring to get some idea of their biologic 'risk factor' by contributing to this kind of research before it is too late."

To inquire about participating in the study, call Aspler at 514-484-4144.

Israel faces painful dilemma, rabbi says

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Israel will "pay a price" for following the lead of the United States in its handling of the Middle East conflict and should count on no one but itself, says Rabbi Avraham Feder, rabbi emeritus of Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

"We're charged with an abnormal task," Rabbi Feder told told an overflow audience at Beth Tikvah last week.

"We have only ourselves to depend upon… because ultimately, God is behind what we do."

Speaking on the topic "War or No War – Whither Israel?" Rabbi Feder discussed Israel's painful dilemma.

On one side is the option of acting unilaterally to "utterly defeat the Palestinians" and that is juxtaposed with "following the U.S. lead because of larger considerations."

These conflicting options have placed Israel in a quagmire, with the result being a ceaseless cycle of "they attack us, we attack them."

Rabbi Feder also addressed the growing tide of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel rhetoric, particularly in academic circles.

"I can't stress enough how disappointed we are at intellectuals," he said.

"We don't have to justify our moral position… Our first Jewish intuition is just to survive [which] means we're morally justified."

Adding caustic humour to his argument, Rabbi Feder paraphrased George Orwell's famous quote, "one has to belong to the intelligentsia to believe things like 'No ordinary man could be such a fool.'"

Rabbi Feder said the intifadah, which has lingered for three years and claimed thousands of Israeli and Palestinian lives, has triggered a shift to the right in the political views of most Israelis.

Even Amos Oz, the acclaimed left-wing Israeli author, has expressed shock at Arab behaviour and has been critical of "paranoiac Islam," he said.

But Rabbi Feder cast doubt on Oz's suggestion that "paranoiac" Muslims can be cured by moderate ones.

The rabbi urged the audience to stretch beyond their means to help Israel, quoting famed Jewish poet Chaim Nachman Bialik, who called on Jews to "stand up and fight for ourselves."

Despite the strife, there is reason for optimism, Rabbi Feder said, citing the examples of Israel's solid relationship with Turkey and evolving relations with India as confidence builders for a state consistently maligned by the international community.

He concluded by saying that while Israel's struggle may be relentless, "we shall prevail."

Henrich hopes to rekindle pro career with Roadrunners

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Michael Henrich still dreams of one day skating for the Edmonton Oilers, but for the time being, there's no place in the world he'd rather be than playing hockey than with its top farm club.

The 23-year-old Toronto Roadrunner is set to make his home-ice debut Nov. 1, when the expansion American Hockey League team appears at the CNE's Ricoh Coliseum after a season-opening nine game road trip.

The Oilers' 1998 first-round selection (13th overall) in the NHL entry draft drew an assist on the franchise's first-ever goal, coming in a 4-3 loss at Milwaukee on Oct. 10. After being shut out 3-0 in Cincinnati the next night, the Roadrunners picked up their first victory Oct. 13 in Hamilton, a 4-2 triumph over the Bulldogs.

"It's really nice when you can play professional hockey and pretty much be at home with your family and friends," said the 6-2, 206-pound winger, who had been living away from his Thornhill home for the past seven years.

He recently moved back in with his parents, whose house is 10 minutes away from the club's main practice facility on the grounds of York University. Henrich says he'll be happy to regularly eat the home-cooked meals he has missed out on since he turned 16.

After contracting mononucleosis at training camp last fall and missing the first two months of the season, Henrich started the year with the Oilers' top minor league affiliate in Hamilton before being assigned to Mora IK, a second-division Swedish League club, to get back into game shape.

He also saw some international duty during his 2½-month stint in Europe as part of the Canadian team that won the 2002 Deutschland Cup in Germany in November. Henrich also represented his country at the Sweden Games in Stockholm and at the 2003 Swiss Cup.

When he returned to North America, he was loaned to the AHL's Hershey Bears (the Colorado Avalanche's minor league club) for the remainder of their season.

In August, he signed a one-year deal with the Roadrunners. The Roadrunners play in the AHL's northern division, which includes the league's other Canadian entries: Manitoba, Hamilton and St. John's.

Henrich made quite an impression at the Oilers' training camp in Edmonton last month, playing in an exhibition game and displaying a new attitude and outlook that could one day see him get called up to the big league club.

"He struggled the last couple of years," said Kevin Prendergast, Edmonton's vice-president of hockey operations. "There was a lot of pressure put on him as a first round draft choice.

"What we wanted to see from Michael is consistency from the day we drafted him, and we're starting to see that now. Where he fits in [long-term], I honestly can't tell you until we see this consistency start coming on a regular basis in Toronto this year."

In the team's first three games of the year, the right winger had one assist and was plus two in the plus/minus column.

A prolific scorer in junior with the Barrie Colts, Henrich's best year was in 1999-2000, when he scored 38 goals and added 48 assists in 66 games. In 25 playoff games that season, he scored 10 goals and pitched in with 18 helpers for 28 points.

His pro career, however, has not seen him even come close to those numbers. His best professional year was in 2001-02 with the Hamilton Bulldogs, when he notched 14 goals and 24 assists in 67 games.

Nevertheless, Henrich could well become the focus of a marketing effort directed at the Jewish community – particularly school-age youngsters – as the season develops. The Roadrunners are planning to hold a B'nai Brith Day at one of their home games later in the season, and talks are underway to have Henrich make some promotional appearances during the year in the Jewish community as part of a motivational campaign.

Israeli ice dancers to appear at Skate Canada

The Israeli ice dancing pair Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky, who competed in last year's Winter Olympics, are slated to participate at the Mastercard Skate Canada International 2003, which runs from Oct. 30 to Nov. 2 at the Hershey Centre in Mississauga, Ont.

Sixth place finishers at the Salt Lake City Olympics, the pair won bronze medals at the World Ice Skating Championships in Nagano, Japan last year. Last week they won the gold medal at Skate Israel, a tournament they hosted at their home rink in Metulla, and in January 2003 they competed in the European Figure Skating Championships in Malmo, Sweden.

The skaters got their start as a dance pair in Israel at Metulla's Canada Centre, which was established in 1990 by UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) through the contributions of Jewish communities across the country.

The centre features the only Olympic-size ice skating rink in the Middle East, and serves as the training capital for Israel's international athletes in figure skating, short track speed skating and hockey.

Chait and Sakhnovsky, both 27, have been skating together since 1995. Chait was born in Israel to parents who immigrated from Moldova and later moved to the United States. Sakhnovsky made aliyah from Moscow 10 years ago.

At Skate Canada, the pair will complete their compulsory elements on the first day of the competition and will compete in the dance program on Sunday, Nov. 2, at noon.

A complete schedule is available on-line at www.city.mississauga.on.ca/hersheycentre/SkateCanada2003.htm.

FICTION AND POETRY

- The True Story of Hansel and Gretel, by Louise Murphy, Penguin Books, SC, $19.50.

This powerful retelling of the famous fairy tale follows the escape of two Jewish children who find refuge with the village "witch." An important contribution to Holocaust literature, this novel captures the profound effect of war and terror on families.

The author will attend a reading at Israel's, 897 Eglinton Ave. W., Tuesday, Oct. 28, 7 p.m.

- Beautiful as the Moon, Radiant as the Stars, edited by Sandra Bark, Warner Books, SC, $22.95.

A wonderful anthology of classic Yiddish stories about women, set in the 19th and 20th centuries. Some of the stories are translated into English for the first time.

- The Fullness of Time, by Gershom Scholem, Ibis Books, SC, $21.99.

This bilingual (English/German) volume of stunning poetry offers the reader a glimpse into the world of the great scholar, mystic and poet.

NON-FICTION

- The Trouble With Islam, by Irshad Manji, Random House, SC, $22.95.

If you read only one book on the Muslim hierarchy and its effect on its people and on the world, this should be it. The courageous author, calling for "honesty and change," is not afraid to tell it like it is; i.e., she doesn't hesitate to suggest that Israel is not to blame for the misery of the Arab refugees.

- Living a Year of Kaddish, by Ari L. Goldman, Schocken Books, HC, $33.

In this thoroughly enjoyable, beautifully written memoir, the author discusses his most profound feelings and experiences following the death of his father.

- Wedding Song, by Farideh Goldin, Brandeis University Press, HC, $38.95.

According to Iranian-Jewish author Gina Nahai, this memoir of an Iranian Jewish woman is "tragic, heartbreaking, and ultimately triumphant. Wedding Song is the story of every woman who has faced the often unsurmountable walls of custom and religion."

YOUTH

Young Adult

- Faces of Courage, by Sally M. Rogow, Granville Island Publishing, SC, $16.95.

Based on true events, these inspiring stories are about brave European teenagers – Jewish and non-Jewish, some with disabilities – who resisted the Nazis.

The author will be in Toronto as part of Holocaust Education Week. Check brochure for details.

- Ask the Rabbi, by Rabbi Ron Isaacs, Jossey-Bass, HC, $35.95.

"An extraordinary collection of questions, an extraordinary collection of answers, Ron Isaacs is indeed the rabbi who can be asked anything. His knowledge is encyclopedic, and this book is a pleasure to read." –Rabbi Joseph Telushkin

Ages 7 and up

- Tasty Bible Stories, by Tami Lehman-Wilzig, Kar-Ben Publishing, SC, $16.99.

This original, beautifully illustrated book of Bible stories includes recipes to correspond with the tales, i.e., baked apple à la mode along with the story of Eve: The Apple of Adam's Eye.

Ages 4-8

- Bagels From Benny, by Aubrey Davis Kids Can Press, HC, $17.95.

A delightful, heartwarming story about a little boy who makes a difference.

Not the day to meet my bashert

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

One rainy fall evening at the end of a weekly lecture, I was confronted with the ideal situation for a Jewish single woman: an ocean of good looking, and presumably single, Jewish men, all standing alone outside class. In order to leave, I had to walk past. As I debated whether I should introduce myself to at least one of them, my thoughts turned to some of my recent dating adventures.

They began when word got out that I was single. I heard a lot of "I know a nice Jewish boy in his 30s that you just have to meet." I am open to the idea of blind dates, so I ended up having many coffees at Starbucks this past summer. Through these dates, I became aware of exactly what I am looking for. It's important, and only fair, to know this before you get into a serious relationship with someone.

A woman whom I admire greatly and is extremely knowledgeable about relationships once said, "The best thing you can do as a single person before you meet your bashert [soulmate] is to know who you are and what you stand for. Prepare yourself by becoming the best possible person you can, so when you meet your partner, you will be ready."

Issues such as children, timelines, living location, lifestyle and where you stand on gender roles are all crucial. Equally important is having an emotional, physical and intellectual connection with your partner (also known as "the date").

I have heard many captivating stories from single friends about their dating experiences. Some have tried the Jewish dating service J-Date. Some have braved speed-dating and other cool dating events through Aish HaTorah. Still others have gone to Jewish singles parties in the community.

So far, the best parts of my blind dates have taken place the night before. In my imagination, my mystery date becomes my knight in shining armour. We fall madly in love, buy a house in Forest Hill and discuss baby names over the romantic vegetarian dinner he has just prepared. I have faith this will happen one day, and then everything will naturally fall into place.

But my instincts told me this wasn't the big day. I made my decision and got up to leave class – alone. I confidently walked past "the bachelors" and headed home in the rain to make my own special dinner in my own cute apartment. Sometimes being single can be really great too.

Canada condemns Israel's security fence

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada has joined other countries in calling on Israel to dismantle its security fence.

Canada was among the 144 nations that last week approved a United Nations resolution demanding Israel stop construction of and tear down the barrier it is building in the West Bank to try to stop the entry of Palestinian terrorists.

While Canada has been criticized for supporting the measure, it also earned lukewarm praise for insisting the resolution include condemnation of the Oct. 4 suicide bombing at a Haifa restaurant that killed 20, and of the Oct. 15 roadside killing of three U.S. security officers in the Gaza Strip.

"It's somewhat encouraging that pressure from Canada and other countries resulted in the inclusion of anti-Israel terror," said David Goldberg of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). "Canada should be given a little credit for that."

This is the security fence as it winds south from Jerusalem separating Bethlehem from Israel's capital city. The government of Israel is building the fence to protect Israelis against incursions by Palestinian terrorists. At left, members of Hamas who support suicide bombings marched through Rafah last week wearing explosive belts. A perimeter fence already exists between Gaza and Israel. No suicide bombers have entered Israel from Gaza since the construction of the fence.

El Al flight could have landed in Toronto

Airline did not ask for plane's diversion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An El Al flight from Israel through Toronto was diverted to Hamilton twice last week, even though airline officials and the Israeli government were content to have the plane land in Toronto.

Citing unspecified security concerns, Transport Canada officials ordered the incoming Boeing 767 to land at Montreal's Mirabel Airport. The plane later took off for the short flight to Hamilton's John C. Munro International Airport, about 60 kilometres west of Toronto. One hundred and seven of the plane's 193 passengers disembarked in Hamilton and, after clearing customs, were brought by bus to Toronto.

The return flight from Los Angeles also landed in Hamilton prior to continuing on to Israel.

Speaking in Ottawa, Transport Minister David Collenette said. "We had information there was a specific threat against this El Al flight and therefore we ordered the pilot to immediately land at Mirabel.

"The threat was at Pearson airport and that is why the flight was asked to land at Mirabel."

Bonds Fetes Minister

TORONTO — State of Israel Bonds Canada earlier this month honoured Maurizo Bevilacqua, secretary of state for international financial institutions, as well as Joe de Wit from local 95 of the International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers and labour lawyer Alan Minksy, at a dinner called "A Salute to Solidarity Between Labour and Management." The annual event highlights the historic relationship between Israel and North American labour, said Larry Waller, Israel Bonds executive vice-president. Proceeds will go to local charities.

ISRAEL

More Seniors In Poverty

JERUSALEM— There are now 680,000 Israeli seniors living below the poverty line, or 26 per cent of that age group, up from 23 per cent of the elderly population last year, according to Labour and Social Affairs Minister Zevulun Orlev. Orlev told the Knesset's finance committee last week that, "Unfortunately, economic policies are dragging many seniors below the poverty line. It is time to take stock and change the picture." Official statistics on 2002 poverty will be published in full next month by Orlev's ministry.

U.S. Travel Warning

JERUSALEM — The U.S. State Department issued an advisory last week for U.S. citizens against travel to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. It came after another advisory that called on U.S. citizens to leave Gaza. The warning noted that terrorist attacks have killed or wounded U.S. citizens, including three Americans killed in Gaza by a roadside bomb while travelling in a diplomatic convoy earlier this month.

City's Population Falls

JERUSALEM— Jerusalem's population fell by nearly 10 per cent in the past decade. Some 164,400 people left Jerusalem over the past 10 years and 97,300 have moved in, according to the upcoming volume of the Statistical Yearbook of Jerusalem. The city is now home to 680,400 people, 67 per cent Jews and 33 per cent Arabs. The Arab population is younger and has a higher growth rate, and its percentage of the overall population is growing.

WORLD

Hate Watchdog Planned

PARIS — French Jewish and Muslim organizations are set to form a group to monitor an upsurge in racially motivated attacks in France. The International League Against Racism and Anti-Semitism, a group close to major French Jewish organizations, announced last week it would support the formation of a joint body to monitor acts of anti-Semitism and Islamophobia. The league's move follows a similar appeal last week by the president of the new Council of Democratic Muslims.

Hollywood Jews Blamed

LOS ANGELES — A magazine columnist has blamed Hollywood Jews for funding the bloody hit movie Kill Bill. Gregg Easterbrook, a senior editor at The New Republic, wrote in his daily Web log that Jewish executives of the Disney-owned Miramax studio, including studio head Harvey Weinstein and Disney CEO Michael Eisner, are to blame for the violence in Quentin Tarantino's new film. While saying Christian and other film executives do the same, Easterbrook asked, "Does that make it right for Jewish executives to worship money above all else, by promoting for profit the adulation of violence?" Easterbrook later told the New York Times the column was "wrong" and "a bad choice of words."

Swiss Jews Charged

ZURICH — A Swiss Jewish group faces charges of racial discrimination because of a letter saying Islam seeks to control the world. Frank Luebke, head of the independent anti-discrimination organization called David, will be in court on Dec. 12 in Zurich in what may be the first application of Swiss anti-bias laws against a Jewish group. At issue is an open letter Luebke wrote after the November 2002 bombing of a Kenyan hotel owned by Israelis and an attempted attack on an Israeli jet over Kenya. Signed by 138 Jews and Christians, the letter, which called the attacks an example of "Islamic-Arabic-Palestinian manic butchery against the Jewish-Israeli civil population," was sent to the Swiss government and parliament. In late 2002, a Swiss Palestinian filed charges against Luebke. Jewish leaders had refused to sign the letter.

Palestinians back terror, distrust U.S.: poll

JERUSALEM — Most Palestinians see terrorism as a legitimate alternative to negotiations and distrust U.S. mediation in the Middle East, a new poll says.

The poll of 1,318 West Bank and Gaza Strip residents, published last week by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, found that 75 per cent supported the Oct. 4 suicide bombing at Haifa's Maxim restaurant that killed 21 people, and 59 per cent said such "armed confrontations so far have helped achieve Palestinian rights in a way that negotiations could not." Nearly 90 per cent also backed attacks on Israeli soldiers and settlers.

Asked about U.S. mediation, 95 per cent said Washington is "not sincere" in its efforts to work for Palestinian statehood and is biased in favour of Israel. Some 78 per cent believe the U.S.-sponsored "road map" peace plan is dead, while 85 per cent support a mutual ceasefire.

The poll also found that support for Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat increased from 35 to 50 per cent from June to October – the highest level in five years – but 82 per cent of Palestinians believe the PA is corrupt, and 90 per cent support internal and external calls for its reform.

Ottawa's Rabbi Bulka adds Jewish touch to McGuinty's big day

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, right, and Lieutenant Governor James Bartleman, left, pose for a photo with Minister of Public Infrastructure Renewal David Caplan after Caplan was sworn in last week. [CP photo/Frank Gunn]

The first few moments of Dalton McGuinty's premiership had a distinctly Jewish flavour, with Rabbi Reuven Bulka, an old Ottawa friend of the new premier, blessing the government at its swearing-in ceremony last Thursday.

And both Jewish MPPs, wearing kippot and clutching Bibles, entered the 22-member cabinet.

Rabbi Bulka, whose synagogue, Congregation Machzikei Hadas, is only minutes from McGuinty's Ottawa South constituency office, told The CJN that someone later offered to research whether this was the first time a rabbi recited the invocation at the swearing-in of a new Ontario government.

"I told him he didn't need to research," Rabbi Bulka said. "I said it was first time I had done it."

He delivered a non-denominational blessing:

"To Team Ontario, which is all of us, and to Ontario's new governing team, we invoke and ask for God's blessing. May you guide, lead and inspire our province to a standard of excellence in which no one is left behind.

"And to you, Premier Dalton McGuinty and your government, may there be no task too daunting, no challenge too onerous, no achievement too elusive as you strive for the best for all Ontarians. God bless you all. Amen."

Earlier, Rabbi Bulka earned hearty laughter when he quipped that "the majesty is in the regal setting at Queen's Park, making our new premier truly a Royal Dalton."

Presiding over the swearing-in was Ontario Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel.

Moments later, veteran MPP and Peterson-era cabinet minister Monte Kwinter, wearing a blue velvet kippah, was sworn in as the new minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services. Kwinter, 72, is responsible for policing and corrections, and will also be asked to review Ontario's emergency preparedness.

The ministry is the latest incarnation of the solicitor general's office that the former Tory government dubbed the public safety and security ministry.

The Liberals have promised to hire 1,000 more police officers over the next four years. Kwinter's ministry oversees all police services, but he will be most directly involved with the Ontario Provincial Police.

A guide in the storm

From the editor's desk

When navigating through a storm, individuals need sharp senses and reliable instruments to guide them.

Saul Singer, a social and political commentator in Israel, is one such reliable human "instrument." An editorial writer and columnist with the Jerusalem Post, his insights are a veritable global positioning system that help us track our path through the cruel, unabating storm of terror that was let loose upon Israel, the Jewish world and the West more than three years ago by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and his confederates.

Singer is a straight-forward thinker whose writing is clear, crisp and forceful. Positioned in the centre-right on the political compass, he hedges no opinions nor pulls any punches. One need not always agree with him to appreciate the way he marshals the facts, builds a case and draws his conclusions with a clarity that is always compelling.

And Singer is well-qualified to offer his opinions. Before moving to Israel in 1994, he served as a foreign policy specialist on various staffs of the United States Congress. His writings have appeared in the Wall Street Journal, Middle East Quarterly, New Leader and Moment. Now Cold Spring Press has just published more than 100 of his Jerusalem Post editorials and weekly "Interesting Times" columns in a collection entitled Confronting Jihad: Israel's Struggle & the World After 9/11.

The essays – about half of which are Singer's editorials – are arranged chronologically, from January 1997 (four of the items predate the year 2000) to July 2003. The author's introduction was written only last month.

The currency of the anthology is one of its great advantages. Singer's observations are a flowing history that moves across events, pinpointing and explaining them even as they are unfolding. Thus there is an immediacy, and sometimes even an urgency, to the anthology that makes it very hard to put down.

Confronting Jihad: Israel's Struggle & the World After 9/11 is arranged in five broad subject areas, four of which deal with issues of peace and security. The fifth subject touches upon societal and economic issues in Israel as well as general issues in the wider Jewish world.

One of the collection's objectives is to demonstrate that terrorism is a scourge that confronts the entire free world. It is not only a problem for Israel.

"If there is a thread running through the essays of this book," Singer writes in the introduction, "it is that there is less separating these two worlds [life in Israel and life in America] than meets the eye. The war is the same war, the enemy is the same enemy, and the strategy for victory is the same strategy."

Singer's political assessments are unsentimental. On Jan. 19, 2001, he wrote the following on the subject of Jerusalem.

"The hope for peace lies in Israel unifying behind its own definition of vital interests and convincing the Palestinians that Israel will stand on its own right to live in this land no less than they will. One of those vital interests is a unified Jerusalem. The [Opposition parties'] rally [a week earlier], therefore, was not just about keeping Jerusalem whole, but about creating a new paradigm for the peace process: instead of reaching farther, standing firmer."

This past Holocaust Remembrance Day, on April 28, Singer wrote: "In pragmatic terms, giving the Arabs a pass on their antisemitism leads inexorably to tolerance for Arab rejection of the Jewish right to self-determination in the only land we have ever known as our own. If the Arabs' Jew-hatred is understandable, how can their desire to destroy Israel not be?"

Where Singer's political commentary can be biting, his social commentary can be tender. Of the death of Yehuda Amichai in Sept. 2000, he wrote, "The missing of poet Yehuda Amichai began with his funeral yesterday, at which we needed him to express what we have lost…

"Amichai was Israel's national poet, but not in the sense of a Walt Whitman, who exuded American patriotism, or the poets who have been catalysts for nationalist passions withing the Arab world. He was national in that his intensely personal expressions of pain, loss, protest, love and beauty somehow spoke for a people that often suppressed such emotions in a flurry of nation-building."

An interesting feature of the anthology that lends it even greater value is the presence of brief contextual remarks by the author at the beginning of each essay. He thus provides commentary, as it were, on his own commentary.

Were I to quibble with the publisher, it would be for failing to provide a more useful table of contents. A full listing of the titles of the individual essays would have been helpful to the reader. None of the titles, though, is referenced. This mere technical oversight, however, impinges on the facility of the material's use, rather than on its overall excellence. There is a storm all around us and it is good that there are guideposts helping us through.

Confronting Jihad: Israel's Struggle & the World After 9/11 is distributed by Simon & Schuster and should be available at local Jewish and general bookstores.

INEXPRESSIBLE SORROW: Friends and family grieve for Sgt. Sarit Shneor-Senior, 19, who was murdered, along with two other soldiers, in Netzarim last week. [Israel Sun photo]

El Al could have landed in Toronto: airline, embassy

Later media reports from Israel indicated the threat was traced to Al Qaeda and involved use of a surface-to-air missile against an El Al aircraft. Last November, a chartered Israeli airliner is believed to have dodged two shoulder-launched surface-to-air missiles fired from outside the Mombasa airport in Kenya.

In Israel, Yediot Achronot quoted an unnamed intelligence source as saying that "on a scale of one to 10, the warning was about three to four. In other words, not really immediate but still a warning that could not be ignored."

The Sun media chain also reported that a threat was called in by phone from the Toronto area and involved a missile attack or strafing the plane with gunfire while it was parked on the tarmac at Pearson. Law enforcement agencies were attempting to trace the call and they were reportedly investigating a possible connection to a rocket launcher that was seized by Customs officials in the last two years along with other weapons at a Mississauga postal plant.

Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian office, said despite intelligence information provided by Israel to Canadian authorities, the El Al jet could have landed in Toronto.

"From the El Al perspective and the Israeli government perspective, landing in Toronto… was acceptable. We could have landed in Toronto from the Israeli perspective."

That assessment was confirmed by Ben Forer, press and economic affairs officer at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa.

Morais said El Al's flights to and from Toronto last Sunday, three days after the diversion, proceeded normally. The flight to Israel was full, he said.

Collenette refused to specify the nature of the threat, telling reporters it was "specific to the El Al flight.

"Israel passed intelligence information to the Canadians and Canada decided to divert the aircraft from Toronto," Collenette said. "The matter is now being investigated by the RCMP, CSIS, Transport Canada and Peel Regional Police."

Later, Collenette suggested the future of El Al fights to Toronto would be examined.

Morais later said "that has been rectified," adding that Transport Canada "gave the green light" to the Sunday flights to and from Israel, as well as to subsequent flights.

On landing in Hamilton, the El Al flight was met by heavy security, with police helicopters and a tactical team surrounding the aircraft. Meanwhile, police searched Pearson International Airport in Toronto and found no evidence of a threat.

Later in the evening, passengers embarking for Israel on the flight's return leg did not board the plane in Toronto. Passengers checked in at Pearson and were bused, with a police escort, to Hamilton, where they boarded the aircraft bound for Tel Aviv.

Despite wide media coverage of the incident, the airliner was full, with 79 passengers originating in Los Angeles and another 114 starting out from Toronto, Morais said.

Morais said departing passengers were reassured by El Al's reputation for security. "We can look after ourselves. Other countries can't do what we can do," he said, adding that El Al's security contingent in Toronto is larger than any other division.

The incident, he said, should alert the Canadian flying public to the seriousness of terrorist threats. "El Al in regards to this issue is the litmus test. Unfortunately, the Canadian government pointed the finger at El Al," Morais said, adding "the issue is the terrorist threat in Canada."

"We just want to add that, in general, this threat emphasized that the whole Western world and Canada is under a terrorism threat," Forer noted.

Russian and Ethiopian immigrants learn to go on

The following stories are adapted from a talk given to UIA Federations Canada by Micha Feldman of SELAH, an Israel crisis management centre.

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

On Friday morning just before Rosh Hashanah three years ago, Sgt. Yossi Teveje, 25, returned to his base from an all night Palestinian-Israeli police patrol near Kalkilya, a small village in the West Bank.

Before breaking for the day, the Ethiopian-Israeli officer insisted that the group at the base share an early morning snack. They relaxed a bit, joked together and before leaving, one or two of the Palestinian police officers wished their Israeli colleagues a Shanah Tovah.

Then, one of the Palestinians went back to his jeep, took an M-16 out of the back seat, turned around and shot seven bullets into Yossi's head and body.

Yossi Teveje was born in the small village of Asavta, Ethiopia. In 1983, at the age of eight, he joined his aunt, Tamar, four cousins and a small group of travellers who were migrating to Israel. Over the next few years, 65,000 Ethiopian Jews would arrive in the Jewish state. On route, 4,000 would die in the African deserts and Sudanese refugee camps.

For three weeks, Tamar and Yossi trekked over the mountainous northern Ethiopian terrain, walking at night and hiding during the day. By the time they arrived at a refugee camp near Khartoum, Yossi was so sick that Tamar feared for his life.

At the camp clinic, the doctor told Tamar the medicine Yossi needed would cost money she didn't have. So Tamar spent her days begging until she had enough to buy the drugs to save her nephew's life. The small family headed by Tamar, who was 24 years old at the time, then continued on to Tel Aviv and settled in Nazeret Elite.

When Yossi was 13, a social worker convinced Tamar to send Yossi to boarding school. Over the years, the traditional Ethiopian woman learned Israeli ways, in which education and success seemed intertwined and children were sent away from their homes at a much younger age than she would ever have imagined.

Slowly, Tamar adapted. On that early morning of Rosh Hashanah in 2000, she had learned enough to understand that the Israeli border police don't send a long row of jeeps at the break of dawn to deliver good news.

Before the commanding officer opened his mouth, Tamar knew that Yossi was dead.

For many Israelis, his death marked the beginning of the second intifadah.

Eight months later, on Friday, June 1, 2001, Alla Nelimov, a single mother, went shopping with her two daughters, Yelena, 18, and Yulia, 16, to buy cheap clothes from the Hatikvah Street market pedlars.

The Nelimovs didn't have much money, but they bought a few things to celebrate the fact that Yulia had just received her Israeli identity card.

It had been four years since Alla had been convinced by her brother that the Israeli educational system was superior to the one that had collapsed in the former Soviet Union. In 1996, Alla brought her mother Fania Schnipper and three children to Israel from Yekatarinburg in Ural, Russia.

Since 1989, about 1.2 million immigrants have arrived in the Jewish state from the former Soviet Union. Like the Ethiopian Jews, the Russian community began adapting to Israeli life.

But the Nelimovs sometimes grew nostalgic. After their Friday shopping, the girls went to their south Tel Aviv home and dressed in old clothes their mother had brought from Russia. They laughed and posed while Alla took pictures. Then Yelena and Yulia made ankle bracelets, put on green nail polish, slipped into their new outfits and left for a celebratory night at the Dolphinarium Disco.

That night, a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the disco, killing 21, and injuring 120 others.

When Alla heard the news, she went looking for her daughters, praying that she would find them among the bloodied bodies of the survivors in the hospital. From there, Alla went to the morgue where the mother identified her daughters, one recognizable only by the green nail polish.

With more than 500 volunteers, SELAH provides immigrants affected by tragedy with immediate and long-term support.

With the help of funding from various organizations, including American Friends of the Israel Crisis Center, Jewish federations and individual donors, SELAH helps newcomers already challenged by an intimidating absorption process cope with official channels of public assistance.

Mica Feldman said SELAH helped Tamar and her family move into a new apartment in Tel Aviv so that she could be near family and friends. He also provided the Nelimovs with emotional support through retreats organized for families affected by terror.

SELAH provides help by visiting the sick and injured, comforting the bereaved, purchasing tombstones, transporting people from hopsital to home and offering counselling for those struggling to raise orphaned grandchildren and younger siblings.

"The grief for all those affected by terrorism is the same," Feldman said. "But the support for newcomers must be different."

Speculation with rueful consequences

There is still a great deal of mystery surrounding the diversion last week of the El Al flight from Tel Aviv away from Toronto, its intended destination, to Montreal and then to Hamilton. Canadian and Israeli officials are understandably reluctant to disclose all the information about the incident lest they compromise the ability to prevent any intended acts of terror. As a result, we have only a sketchy picture, not the full detail, of why the El Al flight made an emergency landing in Montreal.

According to local and Israeli reports, we know at least the following:

- The threat to the airplane emanated from the Toronto area.
- The source of the threat was traced to Al Qaeda.
- The nature of the threat was an attack either by light arms or by a heat-seeking, possibly shoulder-launched missile.
- The risk factor in the threat was said to be "serious."
- The decision to divert the plane away from Toronto was made by Canadian officials.

The incident was a shock to the Canadian psyche. We are simply not used to the need for such emergency measures here. Perhaps that explains federal Minister of Transport David Collenette's clumsy response to reporters in explaining his decision. He defined the threat by differentiating between the victims of the potential harm by suggesting the threat was pointed only at El Al, the national carrier of Israel, rather than at Pearson International Airport, the Canadian port in whose "harbour" El Al and other carriers find shelter.

Thus, he speculated out loud that the future of El Al's Tel Aviv-Toronto flight might have to be reassessed. "I want to assure travellers there is not a problem with travelling to Pearson, to Toronto. But it was specific to that flight… As for subsequent El Al flights, that's something we will have to deliberate, considering the various intelligence that we receive, and we're working on that with others."

How can it be said that the way to fight terror is by surrendering to it? And yet, that was the effective import of Collenette's response. Over the weekend, however, the minister's advisers must have explained the rueful consequences of his speculation.They undoubtedly understood the regrettable implications of the minister's failed attempt at ministerial prudence. Ha'aretz carried a report indicating that "the Canadian government assured Israel on Sunday that El Al flights to Toronto would continue as usual."

But the shock to our psyche must not go unheeded. A "serious" terror threat emanating from the Toronto area must be the springboard for vigorous Canadian counter-terror measures. It is not Israelis who are threatened on our shores by Al Qaeda. It is all of us – Canadians and other nationals who fly our skies and park in our airports.

We have been warned.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Mahathir Mohamad

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad's views about Jewish people come as no surprise to those of us who recall his hateful statements in 1997, when he accused international financier George Soros, and Jews in general, of causing the collapse of Malaysia's currency.

Soros, unlike many global capitalists, had taken his money out of Malayisa because he was disgusted with its labour conditions. We Jews should realize that international capitalism has mandated a "race to the bottom," with dictators like Mahathir laughing all the way to Swiss banks with sweatshop profits.

Take a close look at some of your designer garments. Chances are some of them were made by labourers in Malaysia at gunpoint for the equivalent of about two dollars a day. Labour unions are virtually banned and ethnic Han Chinese are treated as second-class citizens.

Mahathir and Chrétien

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's actions speak so loudly that I cannot hear his words. Or perhaps I cannot hear them because he had none to offer.

What does he advise me to say to my Holocaust survivor mother when she hears he "had nothing to add" on her behalf to Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, who accused Jews of running the world?

How should I reassure her that this is not the 1930s in Europe when she hears that Chrétien shook Mahathir's hand after he said, "The Europeans killed six million Jews out of 12 million, but today, the Jews rule the world by proxy?"

Perhaps Chrétien himself should offer to comfort her, because I have nothing to say in his defence.

More on Mahathir

It is a sad comment indeed that in the year 2003, the Jewish community has to congratulate Canada's foreign minister, Bill Graham, for condemning the anti-Semitic remark of Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad. It is sadder still that our prime minister shook hands with Mahathir without uttering a word of rebuke. That the heads of 57 Muslim states, including those that have signed peace treaties with Israel and those that are purported allies of the West, should give Mahathir a standing ovation is outrageous. If the remarks made by Mahathir were not so odious and hateful, they would almost be laughable.

I challenge Graham to have Canada introduce a resolution at the United Nations condemning Mahathir for his slanderous statement and for promoting hatred against the Jewish people. Unquestionably, the resolution would be defeated, but it would be interesting to see how many other countries would stand up and be counted as supporting and encouraging anti-Semitism.

Proposal for CIJA

I was privileged to participate recently in a focus group of grassroots advocates for Israel and Judaism. Among the participants were two people who spend a tremendous amount of time and effort doing advocacy, armed mainly with their computers and their eloquence.

Neither can afford to attend conferences on advocacy or participate in a mission to Israel in order to better arm themselves with more information to strengthen their positions. I call upon the new Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy to allot funds to enable these types of individuals to continue to expand their work.

We need every Jew to be a spokesperson for Israel, not only the prominent or salaried.

Israel's policies have failed

The current Israeli government's emphasis solely on military measures to subdue terrorism has failed. The level of mutual hatred and distrust between Israelis and Palestinians has never been higher. The lives of both peoples have become sheer hell.

The Zionist organizations of Diaspora Jewry must now more effectively open up forums for discussion about the alternative ideas now being circulated in Israel. What is at stake, according to people such as Labour MK Avraham Burg, who has written recently on these issues, are the guiding values and principles of the Zionist enterprise as we have known it since 1948: a strong Jewish State with justice and democracy for all.

Anti-Semitism and irony

In her recent opinion piece ("From Kishinev to Canada," CJN, Oct. 23), Sara Horowitz wonders about the root cause of anti-Semitism. In his essay "Auto-emancipation," published in 1882 after a number of pogroms in Czarist Russia, Achad Ha'am (Asher Ginzberg, 1856-1927) thought he had a clear answer: "The world nations feel contempt toward Jews because Jews are not a nation with their own land… The true remedy [for anti- Semitism, or 'Judophobia' as he called it] is, therefore, the creation of a Jewish nation, of people with their own land." (One of his favorite solutions was to form a Jewish territory in North America.)

I am sure that even Achad Ha'am would have found it ironic that in the 21st century, anti- Semitism's focal point has become the State of Israel, which was supposed to prevent Judophobia.

'Little Dunkirk' – a very different Holocaust story

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG

It was an unusually chilly morning on Oct. 7, 1943, and Dr. Karl Henry Koster, medical head of the Bispebjerg Hospital, one of the Copenhagen's largest, was just about to enter his third-floor office in the main wing after completing his first round of inspections when he noticed one of his medical students, Jorgen Knudsen, rushing towards him.

The doctor paused at the half-opened door to wait. Knudson, a strapping young man just recently married and supporting himself by driving an ambulance on his "free" days, gestured breathlessly that he wanted them both to go into the office before speaking. Once inside, still out of breath, he apologized hoarsely

"Please excuse me, Dr. Koster, but I am desperate. Time is short and I don't know whom else I can turn to. Once, during one of your demonstrations, you hinted strongly about your opposition to the Nazis, and there is a rumour among the students that you are active in the underground."

An Israeli stamp commemorating the 30th anniversary of the rescue of the Jews of Denmark.

He paused, and when the Doctor nodded encouragingly, he continued: "Yesterday morning, just as I was leaving for work in my ambulance, some of my student friends rushed over to me to tell me that the Gestapo were rounding up the Jews, and urged me to warn all my Jewish friends. But I didn't know which of my friends or acquaintances were Jewish. I ran to the nearest phone book and took down names that seemed obviously Jewish. When I drove to the addresses, I had to warn them. Many had no place where they could go, so I took them in my ambulance. But now I don't know where to hide them so I decided to ask you to help."

He had 40 men, women and children, he said, and he wondered if they could be hidden at the hospital until they could be smuggled out of Copenhagen. The doctor instantly agreed and told Knudsen to bring the 40 the next morning, to give him time to prepare the hospital.

To get the group past the Gestapo, they agreed to stage a mock funeral. Sure enough, promptly at eight the next morning, a frantic gatekeeper reported to Koster that a hearse and a large funeral party carrying flowers were demanding entry at the hospital's main gate. When Koster went down to welcome the party, he found Knudsen with some more of his students, but instead of the 40 souls he had expected there were 140!

In the next few days, Bispebjerg Hospital would hide almost another 1,000 refugees, who were then smuggled to the small fishing villages on the coast a few sea miles from Sweden across the Sund, the strait that separates Denmark from southern Sweden.

At the hospital, they were hidden as patients under fictitious names and in 130 apartments that the nurses vacated for them. Almost the whole staff helped. Many risked their lives volunteering to transport the Jews to the fishing villages. Some of the doctors and nurses were caught and arrested, and on being freed, went right back to the rescue effort. A few were killed by the Gestapo.

The Bispebjerg Hospital rescue is only one of a host of hair-raising experiences recorded during this truly different Holocaust story – Denmark's inspiring rescue of almost all of its Jewish population of 8,000. The story of this heroic rescue has come to be known as "Little Dunkirk" because of the motley assortment of small craft used to ferry the Jews to safety in Sweden.

What made the courageous effort of the hundreds of staff at Bispebjerg Hospital even more remarkable was the fact that it was not the exception, but the norm. From King Christian X – whose brusque answer to the Nazi demand that Denmark do something about its "Jewish Problem" was that Denmark had no Jewish problem because its Jews were equal Danes: "Viking Jews" he called them – to the humble street cleaner, all took part.

Tens of thousands of Danes, businessmen, professors (the University of Copenhagen went on strike to protest, but likely also because so many of its students and faculty were involved in the rescue effort), clergy, taxi drivers, fishwives, farmers, train conductors, even policemen, took up the challenge to sabotage the Nazi effort to destroy the Jewish community of Denmark. The authorities refused to cooperate, and the bishops circulated a pastoral letter to be read to all congregations denouncing the Nazi attempt as un-Christian, and urging their parishioners to help their Jewish fellow citizens.

Night Passage*, by Karen Gunderson. Charcoal on linen-backed paper, 8"x11", 1991, an artistic depiction of the rescue.

For three weeks, beginning on the night of Rosh Hashanah, Oct. 1, 1943, the Germans hunted frantically for Danish Jews, and the Danes smuggled them out in fishing boats, pleasure craft, even rowboats across the strait to a welcoming Sweden.

Some 7,200 Danish Jews and Jewish refugees who had escaped the Nazi terror since 1933, as well as 700 non-Jewish relatives of these Jews (from mixed marriages, etc.) escaped the fate of their co-religionists in all the Nazi-occupied countries of Europe.

The Germans did manage to arrest about 500, whom they transported to the "model" concentration camp at Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia. But so powerful was the Danes' concern for their Jewish citizens that the Danish government bureaucracy (the actual government had resigned) and the public sent food parcels to Theresienstadt and successfully demanded that the Germans allow a Danish delegation to come and check on the Danish detainees.

There is no doubt that this active concern by their fellow Danes ensured that very few perished and that, unlike the other Jews at Theresienstadt, they were not sent to the crematoria at Auschwitz.

Most Holocaust historians now agree that the German commanders in Denmark, S.S. Gen. Werner Best – who had been one of Reinhard Heydrich's most effective deputies in the implementation of the "final solution" elsewhere in Europe – and the military commander, Gen. von Hannecken, were aware of the rescue, but were forced to ignore it out of the fear of Danish resoluteness. They feared that Denmark, strategically located and supplying Germany with 10 per cent of its food, would rise in total revolt and hamper the already stalling German war effort.

One of the survivors of the rescue, Toronto resident Jon Haas, with his daughter Anna. Haas will be present at the ceremony commemorating the 60th anniversary of the rescue, which launches this year's Holocaust Education Week from Oct. 30 to Nov. 11. A special exhibit on the rescue will be on display at Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson St., Toronto, for the duration of the week.

The material cost of this operation was borne largely by the Danes themselves. This national effort, at first almost totally spontaneous, but then increasingly managed by the Danish underground that hitherto had been marginal, galvanized the Danish resistance movement and turned Denmark from a quiescent backwater in the struggle with Nazi Germany into one of the most active guerrilla fronts. Many Allied fliers were to benefit during the rest of the war from the escape network the Danes had so hurriedly but successfully established to save their Jewish friends and neighbours.

Almost as astounding as the spontaneous Danish rescue of the Jews, was the joyous welcome they received on returning. Most remarkable of all, and providing once more a striking difference from the often resentful and violent reception encountered by the few Holocaust survivors on their return to other parts of Europe like Poland or Hungary, was the fact that their Danish neighbours had carefully safeguarded Jewish businesses, houses and even personal property.

Dr. Nathan Bamberger, whose father was the rabbi of the famous old Leaderstraede Synagogue during the rescue, recalls with wonder that "when we returned to our home, which we had had to leave so suddenly on the eve of Rosh Hashanah 1943, all the settings at our dining table were still exactly as we had left them."

Would Rabin have delivered peace?

Lawrence Hart
in Hamilton

Contrived though it was, who can forget the image of that fateful handshake on the White House lawn in September 1993? And though there was inevitable uncertainty around what might happen next, there was in the signing of the Oslo accords at least an initial glimmer of hope that a sustainable peace between Israelis and Palestinians would eventually materialize.

With the benefit of hindsight, there has been more than ample speculation on why the Oslo process was unsuccessful and why, for that matter, other negotiations since then have also floundered.

While critics of Israel will all too quickly point to any number of alleged misdemeanours by a succession of Israeli governments, the real blame for all the diplomatic failures since Oslo must rest squarely and unequivocally with the Palestinian leadership.

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat himself has been the most consistent obstacle to progress of any sort. Aside from the more blatant examples of Arafat's intransigence – such as his outright rejection of the Camp David proposals – there is, according to many analysts, a much more complex and abiding principle that has been driving his agenda for many years.

Joel Fishman, in the September 2003 issue of Jerusalem Viewpoints, frames the Palestinian strategy in terms of what he describes as the "people's war paradigm." According to this concept, "conflict is waged on both the political and military levels, but for militarily weaker guerrilla groups, political conflict is more important, especially the delegitimization of an adversary and the division of his society." Founded in the Marxist traditions of China and Vietnam, such tactics have undoubtedly found fresh application in the Mideast conflict.

Former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was slain on November 4, 1995, and as we approach the eighth anniversary of his death, it is compelling to again consider his legacy within the context of the peace process for which he risked so much.

Reflecting on his handshake with Arafat, he once commented that "of all the hands in the world, it was not the hand that I wanted or dreamed of touching." Yet touch it he did, firm in his conviction that "you don't make peace with friends. You make it with very unsavoury enemies." Such was the measure of the war hero turned statesman who wanted so badly to broker a durable end to the hostilities that had plagued his people for so long.

There are those who believed in 1993, and who still believe, that it was Rabin, and Rabin alone, who had the credibility to convince both Jews and Arabs to make the compromises that would make peace a reality.

But then again, there was, and still is, that "people's war paradigm" and the deviousness of Arafat to contend with. The likelihood of even Rabin succeeding would have been remote at best.

Both sides now: loving and loathing Israel

Robert Sarner
in Jerusalem

They love us, they love us not, they love us, they love us not…

The contrast couldn't be more extreme. Earlier this month, during a week when Israel was bashed, maligned, ostracized, vilified, shunned, slammed, berated and raked over the coals by much of the international community for its building of a security fence in the West Bank and its air strike on a terrorist camp in Syria, 3,000 Christians from around the world paraded through downtown Jerusalem in support of Israel.

They marched in delegations representing 80 countries. Dressed in their national costumes, they waved banners and sang songs in solidarity with Israel. Their unfettered love for our besieged little nation was heart-warming for most Israelis, if not a bit bewildering.

These days, Israelis are much more accustomed to ill wind from abroad than warmth from strangers. We're far more used to being persona non grata on the world stage. Many people despise our government and everything it stands for. They blame us for many of the world's troubles. They denounce us as an American beachhead in the Middle East. They resent us being tough, assertive and flexing our muscles in self defence. Do I exaggerate? If so, not by much.

To be an Israeli today is to be hated by much of the world. We know it and feel it. We've almost come to expect it, not out of Jewish paranoia but from mounting evidence. We're almost resigned to such antipathy.

It's nothing personal of course, not aimed at me or my family or friends and neighbours, just our country. It's just a visceral contempt for Israel. Not new but more aggressive and more widespread than in the past.

Today, Israel seems to have reached a worrying new low in international opinion, even worse than during the Lebanon War in 1982. Hostility (sometimes masking a not-so-latent anti-Semitism) is growing. It takes many forms, often going way beyond condemning specific actions to questioning Israel's very legitimacy. As part of a sinister effort to turn it into a pariah state, our adversaries demonize Israel, portraying it as a rogue entity and the main cause of world terror.

Few countries, if any, have been the object of such loathing and hypocrisy. From the knee-jerk, one-sided anti-Israeli resolutions at the United Nations to the often harsh, tendentious, ignorant and unfair coverage in the foreign media; from the economic, cultural and academic boycotts of Israel to the anti-Israeli divestiture campaigns on university campuses; from the vile anti-Israel propaganda to the threats to prosecute Israeli leaders as war criminals, the assault on Israel is relentless.

It's fuelled by an unholy alliance of government ministers, diplomats, intellectuals, academics, poets, Islamic fundamentalists, neo-Nazis, anti-globalization protesters and assorted self-appointed human rights and non-governmental organizations.

Their double standard is obvious. Haters of Israel single it out for special treatment, holding it to different standards than other countries. They make demands asked of nobody else, scolding it for actions no other country is ever condemned for.

They see what they want to see, ignoring that Israel is defending itself against a Palestinian terrorist war led by mass murderers hell-bent on its destruction. The slaughter of Israeli civilians and other facts don't get in the way of Israel bashers, who create Web sites and hold up placards depicting Israelis as Nazis, placing the Star of David alongside the swastika. It makes you want to vomit in revulsion.

This is not to suggest that Israel is beyond reproach. There is plenty to question and criticize, as there is in any democracy. And in Israel, in sharp contrast to all its Arab neighbours, the citizens, judiciary, press and parliament are often highly critical of the government and public institutions, without fear. Legitimate criticism is one thing. Virulent hostility is another.

The flipside of anti-Israel poison is the unabashed love for Israel shown by its supporters abroad, Jewish and non-Jewish. Fortunately, Israel has many such friends, even if nowhere near enough. The Christian pilgrims who came for the annual Jerusalem March provided much more than a badly needed boost to the city's ailing economy. Their presence gave local residents a much-appreciated morale lift. Too bad more Diaspora Jews don't do the same.

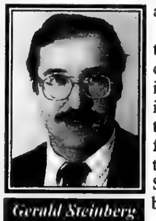
The tragic myths of instant peace



Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

It doesn't require a degree in psychology to realize that we live in an era of instant gratification. Every day, millions of people skip the time-consuming process of shopping, cooking and cleaning up by eating at fast-food restaurants. Instant messaging and e-mail have replaced carefully written and slowly delivered letters. In most cases, you get what you pay for. An instant meal is forgotten immediately after it is consumed, while the shelf life of e-mail is a few minutes.

The same phenomenon has led to the prominence of instant peace agreements, which have replaced the slow process of confidence building and careful, step-by-step negotiation of lasting agreements. Like fast-food meals and e-mail correspondence, these instant agreements, flogged by armies of public relations hacks using carefully choreographed and grandiose signing ceremonies, have an unfortunate habit of evaporating almost immediately.

The latest example of the appeal of instant peace, at least to foreign diplomats (including the Canadian government) and journalists and pundits who cover the Middle East, is the negotiation of what has become known as the "Geneva accord." A group of self-appointed and well-financed Israelis, headed by Yossi Beilin, and a group of Palestinians loyal to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat recently announced that they had finalized (well, almost finalized – some minor "details" remain to be ironed out) a 50-page Palestinian-Israeli peace treaty. They claim to have achieved a modern miracle by eliminating all the obstacles to peace, including the issues of Jerusalem, borders, settlements, the acceptance of Israel's legitimacy and refugee claims.

After decades of hatred, war and terror, including the past three years of hell, instant peace, it would appear, is within our grasp. All that is lacking is an Israeli government that will sign this agreement. And with huge outside funding and a concerted attack against the government of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, it is perhaps possible this can be engineered as well.

But even if Israeli voters – who recently dealt the Israeli leaders of this effort an unprecedented and humiliating defeat and are not about to forget Beilin's central role in the Oslo peace process – change their minds, this will not bring this Oslo sequel to life.

And even if the problems in the still-incomplete text – not to mention the arguments between Palestinian officials on the interpretations of it, and the absence of any serious effort to consider the mechanisms for ensuring the promised demilitarization of a Palestinian state (the same pledges that were ignored under Oslo) – are resolved, this latest agreement will not result in peace.

And even if the wholesale concessions accepted by this group of Israelis – such as the return, for the most part, to the 1949 armistice lines (usually misnamed "1967 borders"), the division of Jerusalem and the acceptance of a Palestinian state – are not interpreted as capitulation and weakness, this agreement will not end the conflict.

A real and lasting process of peace and reconciliation, one that does not evaporate immediately after the ink has dried and the television crews have moved on to the next story, requires slow and careful development. Formulas for resolving the technical issues such as borders, settlements and refugees are the easy part, but they are simply symptoms of the wider disease.

To deal with the core causes of the conflict, the process must begin on the "street," with a new generation that has not been taught the myths of rejectionism and hatred. The "instant peace" approach does not, and cannot, deal with these issues.

Nevertheless, the intense desire of the "diplomatic community," journalists and even many impatient and traumatized Israelis for instant solutions has given this latest public relations exercise a great deal of hype and serious attention.

A real and lasting peace agreement in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict will take far longer to develop and will not pretend to resolve all the issues in a matter of a few weeks, or even a few years.

The tragedy is that on issues such as war and peace, unlike fast-food dinners and instant messaging, the damage from false hopes and the shift of focus and resources from the slow, steady process of building bridges and creating understanding is irreversible.

The Kirshner File

Joe Lieberman casts his eye on the presidency

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Three years after Al Gore chose him as his vice-presidential running mate on the Democratic ticket, the first Jew to be tapped for that position by a major American political party, Joseph (Joe) Isador Lieberman is back in the limelight. Lieberman is running for president, having made his intention known last January in Stamford, Conn., his hometown.

A three-term U.S. senator, he threw himself into the fray a little more than a month after Gore said he would not contest his party's nomination for the 2004 election.

Lieberman, 61, is far from home free. He faces eight rivals, the strongest of whom are Howard Dean, the former governor of Vermont; sitting U.S. senators, John Kerry (Massachusetts) and John Edwards (North Carolina), and retired four-star general Wesley Clark.

Until a few months ago, Lieberman was the front-runner, trading on his name, his reputation as a widely respected politician and his strong fundraising base. But lately, his lead has evaporated and his ability to draw financial contributions has waned.

According to the Washington Post, the race for the Democratic nomination is unsettled and up for grabs. Nevertheless, Lieberman is still very much a contender.

The candidates will face their real big tests early next year, when the Iowa caucus, the New Hampshire primary and the primaries in South Carolina and Missouri take place. By March, a winner will emerge, and he will face President George W. Bush in the November 2004 election.

It remains to be seen whether the country is ready for a Jewish presidential candidate, let alone a Jewish president. But Lieberman, an observant Jew, seems unconcerned by these imponderables, being of the view that Americans are past the point where a candidate's religion might pose a problem.

"I'm asked this question more by the media than voters as I go along," he said after announcing his candidacy on Jan. 13. "I'm running as an American who happens to be Jewish, and not the other way around."

In an interview with the Forward earlier this summer, Lieberman adopted the same upbeat tone. The typical American voter is fair, sensible and will not be swayed by prejudice, he said. "I urge those in the Jewish community who are anxious about it to have faith in America. I do."

Certainly, Gore's historic decision to tap Lieberman as his running mate in 2000 had no discernible adverse effects on their ticket. The Gore/Lieberman team won more votes than Bush and his running mate, Dick Cheney, but lost the election after the U.S. Supreme Court ratified the Republican victory in Florida.

Observers believe that Gore picked Lieberman, a centrist like himself, because of Lieberman's moral probity. He was the first Democratic senator to denounce the sexual antics of former president Bill Clinton in the Monica Lewinsky affair.

On Sept. 3, 1998, with the scandal threatening to engulf the Clinton White House, Lieberman delivered an impassioned speech in the Senate in which he questioned Clinton's morals. "Such behaviour is not just inappropriate – it is immoral," he thundered.

It must have been an emotionally wrenching experience for Lieberman to have attacked Clinton, one of his oldest friends. In 1970, when Lieberman ran successfully for the Connecticut state senate, Clinton, then a Yale University law student, campaigned for him. Twenty two years later, Lieberman returned the favour, becoming the first senator outside the South to endorse Clinton's presidential quest.

Gore – Clinton's vice-president for eight years– asked Lieberman to be his running mate mainly because he wanted to distance himself from his boss' moral lapses and thereby improve his chances against Bush.

Bush had harped on the Lewinsky imbroglio, promising to restore "dignity and honour" to the White House. For Gore, Lieberman – an upstanding family man – was an antidote to Clinton. Gore also liked Lieberman's middle-of-the-road politics.

As a senator, Lieberman has voted for liberal-tinged civil and abortion rights, gun control legislation, affirmative action policies, welfare reforms, tax increases and consumer protection and environmental laws.

Describing himself as a pragmatic "Kennedy Democrat," he is fond of recalling his participation in the 1960s Mississippi civil rights movement.

But over the objections of organized labour and teachers unions, Lieberman has been in favour of tuition vouchers, which allow parents to send their children to private schools at taxpayer expense. And he has been quite critical of smutty Hollywood films, a position that hardly endears him to the generally pro-Democrat entertainment industry.

A member of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council, he supports military spending to a far greater degree than many of his fellow Democrats.

And in conformity with his identity as a devout Jew, Lieberman believes that religion should play a bigger role in American public life. During the 2000 campaign, he returned to this theme repeatedly.

"As a people, we need to reaffirm our faith and renew the dedication of our nation and ourselves to God and God's purpose," he said in a speech.

In general, his emphasis on religion played well in the U.S. heartland, helping the Democrats emerge from the shadow of the Lewinsky scandal.

Yet interestingly enough, his faith-based comments drew a rebuke from one large Jewish organization. The Bnai Brith's Anti-Defamation League asked him to tone down his remarks concerning religion.

Several months ago, Lieberman revisited the topic. "In Washington today," he told a Reform Judaism conference, "there are many who would suggest that faith leads only in one direction: the conservative political direction. That is self-evidently not so."

Joe Lieberman
in July 2000

Such views have prompted some Democrats to accuse Lieberman of being too right of centre for the party's liberal base.

"The bottom line is, he is defined as a conservative," Donna Brazile, the campaign manager of the Gore/Lieberman ticket, said recently.

Yet, as his voting record attests, Lieberman is only slightly to the right of mainstream rivals such as Edwards and Kerry.

Last month, in an effort to dampen talk that he is too conservative, Lieberman charged that some of his Democratic opponents, notably Dean, have strayed too far to the left. Declaring that his policies are rooted in the "vital centre" of the political spectrum, he warned that Democrats face defeat if they abandon the policies that helped elect Clinton in 1992 and 1996.

"I share the anger of my fellow Democrats with George Bush and the wrong direction he has taken our nation," he said at the National Press Club. "But the answer to his outdated, extremist ideology is not to be found in outdated extremes of our own."

Despite his harsh dismissal of Bush's philosophy, Lieberman – who was one of only 10 Democratic senators who backed a congressional bill to prosecute the 1991 Gulf War – and Bush concur on key foreign policy issues.

Lieberman supported the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, saying that force was the only way to dislodge the Taliban regime and combat radical Islamic terrorism.

More to the point, he espoused regime change in Iraq, calling for Saddam Hussein's ouster. On Iraq, Lieberman was one of Bush's strongest Democratic allies.

Of late, though, he has said that Bush's postwar policies in Iraq have eroded public support for what he called "a just war."

Lieberman, who visited the Middle East late last year, has taken a great interest in the Arab-Israeli dispute.

He expressed support for Saudi Arabia's 2002 diplomatic initiative, which offers Israel the promise of peace with the Arab world in exchange for a full withdrawal to the pre-1967 border and a just resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem. In addition, he has voiced support for Palestinian statehood.

Lieberman supports the road map, the internationally sponsored peace plan that envisages a two-state solution.

But he objects to the fact that it should be implemented by both sides reciprocally rather than sequentially, and he thinks that Israel should only carry out its obligations after the Palestinian Authority makes a 100 per cent effort to eradicate terrorism.

Lieberman opposes veiled U.S. threats to reduce aid to Israel unless it changes the route of the security fence through the West Bank.

He contends the United States is too dependent on foreign oil. In this spirit, he recently introduced a national energy bill to completely eliminate the need for such offshore supplies.

It remains to be seen whether Lieberman can win his party's nomination. But even if he does, he will face a formidable opponent in Bush.

Holocaust oratorio premieres during Holocaust Education Week

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A full-length musical work by violinist and composer Ruth Fazal that is scored for orchestra, children's chorus, adult choir and three solo vocalists will have its world premiere in Toronto early November.

Fazal's Oratorio Terezin weaves together 14 children's poems written during their time in Terezin concentration camp with selections from the Bible in an emotional charged oratorio that explores, as Fazal writes on her Web site (www.ruthfazal.com), whether God can be found in place of pain.

Oratorio Terezin will be performed at the George Weston Recital Hall of the Toronto Centre for the Arts Saturday, Nov. 1 at 8 p.m. and Sunday, Nov. 2 at 3 p.m., to coincide with Toronto's annual Holocaust Education Week.

It will tour Europe in 2004 and Israel in 2005.

Fazal, a Christian singer/songwriter who was born in England, began studying both piano and violin in her childhood but later switched focus to the violin and won a scholarship to study violin in Paris for two years.

Since arriving in Toronto in 1975, Fazal has performed with all the city's major orchestras and several of its chamber music ensembles. Currently the concertmaster of all three orchestras of the Mississauga Symphonic Association as well as the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir Orchestra, she is frequently heard on CBC radio and has recorded 18 albums of her songs and instrumental music.

Composer/violinist Ruth Fazal standing on the railway tracks at Auschwitz, where she played her violin.

Fazal told The CJN that she got the idea for the oratio when someone loaned her the book I Never Saw Another Butterfly: Children's Drawings and Poems from Terezin Concentration Camp 1942-1944, edited by Hana Volavkova.

From 1941 to 1944, more than 15,000 children were among the thousands of Jews who were held captive by the Nazi regime in the ghetto/transit camp of Terezin, a small town northwest of Prague (known in German as Theresienstadt). Only 100 children survived.

"The poetry of the children really touched my heart," says Fazal. "I felt that I would like to weave them together with portions of the Hebrew Bible."

She began working on the score four years ago.

"The whole purpose of the oratorio is to attempt to portray the heart of God in the midst of human suffering. It has been an incredible four-year journey for me."

Last year, Fazal visited Europe and went to Terezin and to Auschwitz-Birkenau.

"The highlight of the trip for me was standing at the railway tracks at Auschwitz playing my violin."

Fazal is concertmaster of Oratorio Terezin, which blends vocals with the music of the New Streams Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Kirk Trevor.

The soloists are tenor Huw Priday, baritone Daniel Lichti and Teresa Gomez. Jakie Young, 11, the only children's soloist who was chosen to sing the pivotal and haunting I Never Saw Another Butterfly, is a Grade 6 student at the Associated Hebrew Schools. The junior cantor at the Beth Torah Synagogue has appeared as a soloist at numerous community concerts and events.

It is miraculous that the children's poetry has survived, Fazal says.

"The poetry of the children has a hope and an innocence about it," she says.

In one of the poems, an anonymous child writes, "A fourth year of waiting, like standing above a swamp, From which any moment might gush forth a spring." Another child, indignant, writes, "If in barbed wire things can bloom, why couldn't I? I will not die!"

"It was very important for me, as I wrote the music for these poems, that it should somehow reflect the same naiveté and hope, despite their suffering and despair," Fazal says.

Tickets for the two performances, which are sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada, are $35 and $45. Call Ticketmaster at 416-870-8000 or visit www.oratorioterezin.com.

Jewish pluralism still an issue, says rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The notion that Orthodox rabbis can't share a podium with their non-Orthodox colleagues for fear of giving them legitimacy represents a "level of stupidity and narishkeit [foolishness] that has to come to an end once and for all," says Rabbi Donniel Hartman.

"I can sit next to you and say you're wrong," the Orthodox scholar told an audience at Beth Tzedec Congregation last week, expounding on the results of his two decades of work in the field of Jewish pluralism.

Rabbi Hartman, along with his father Rabbi David Hartman – who ordained him – is co-director of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, a pluralistic Jewish educational institution. He is also a recent PhD, having just completed his doctorate in Jewish philosophy at Hebrew University on "Deviance and the Limits of Tolerance in Jewish Law."

Among the programs the U.S.-born rabbi started at the institute is the Centre for Rabbinic Enrichment, a program of study for North American rabbis of every denomination who are endorsed by their respective Jewish federations. (Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec and Rabbi John Moscowitz of Holy Blossom Temple are among the participants.)

"Our mission is to enhance the quality of Jewish life," said Rabbi Hartman, who also initiated a program of Jewish studies that is being used in 25 per cent of Israel's secular high schools.

Although Jewish pluralism has been eclipsed in the Jewish and Israeli media by the ongoing conflict with the Palestinians, that doesn't mean it's no longer an issue, said Rabbi Hartman. In fact, he said in an interview preceding his talk, discussion on the topic has never stopped.

"When one ideology wins, 90 per cent of the Jewish people lose," he told The CJN. "Through diversity we are able to provide a religion that people want to be a part of. If there's only one door, too many Jews won't want to walk through it."

For the past 20 years, he said, he has been trying to figure out "how a community could live with each other despite difference and diversity." In his talk, which was a joint program sponsored by Beth Tzedec, a Conservative congregation, and its Reform neighbour Holy Blossom, Rabbi Hartman said that in every healthy community, there is a struggle between the search for commonality and the acceptance of diversity.

Distinguishing between tolerable and intolerable differences is a key question, Rabbi Hartman said. The latter implies that the person is no longer a member in good standing of the community.

Public desecration of Shabbat was considered intolerable deviance until the 19th century, he noted, because it was considered a declaration of wanting to separate from the Jewish people.

Today, he said, intermarriage, which has become widespread, can no longer be considered intolerable deviance. That doesn't mean one has to treat it as "pluralism," he cautioned, using a term he defines as granting equal authenticity to differences one may disagree with.

Rabbi Hartman recommends limiting the category of "intolerable difference" to a maximum of three defining criteria. His three bottom lines for inclusion in the Jewish community – and he stressed they are answers that he's "playing with" – are a shared history, the notion of a Jewish calendar and Jewish ethics.

"If you have the same past, you might choose a certain chapter and I might choose another," he said, "but at least I know we're talking about the same book."

He is not in favour of "tests" of acceptance, such as whether Reform and Orthodox Jews can pray together. "Why should I eat in your home if I don't believe it's kosher? Why can't you accept that I disagree with you, and that there's nothing wrong with that disagreement? Maybe I'm saying it's also Judaism, but it's not my Judaism… Orthodox, Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionists can, in fact, live together if we understand that we don't have to agree."

He warned against setting criteria that would include or exclude too many people.

On the thorny question of conversion, Rabbi Hartman suggested that a monolithic system is needed. "It will require all of us to compromise… The Orthodox will have to give up on the notion that the only way to convert is to be Orthodox.

"If we don't have a shared conversion process, there's no notion of shared Jewishness."

Kwinter, Caplan enter cabinet

Kwinter told reporters that one of his first priorities is to prevent the politicization of policing.

"I want to treat them in a professional way and I want to let them know I appreciate their profession," he said.

David Caplan, MPP for Don Valley East, was also sworn in as minister of Public Infrastructure and Renewal and as deputy government house leader. In attendance was Caplan's mother, federal National Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan, herself a provincial cabinet minister under former Liberal premier David Peterson.

Caplan, 39, will oversee a new ministry devoted to renewing the province's schools, hospitals, sewers and transportation systems. The portfolio replaces Ontario SuperBuild Corp., the agency the former Progressive Conservative government established in 1999.

Representing the Jewish community at the ceremony was Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Police sued for negligence in Baranovski case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli-born Daniel Weiz, who was acquitted of murder charges in connection with the beating death of Matti Baranovski, is suing the two lead detectives in the case and the Toronto Police Services Board (TPSB) for negligence and malicious prosecution.

Weiz, 23, filed a statement of claim in court last week claiming $9 million in damages from detectives Larry Linton and Frank Skubic and the TPSB. The court documents allege "the conduct of the police… was high-handed, reckless, callous, wanton and plagued by tunnel vision."

Weiz, along with Meir Mariani and Lee Cochrane, both of whom were young offenders at the time, were each charged with second degree murder in connection with the beating of Baranovski in a North York park in November 1999. Evidence at trial indicated a group of masked young men confronted Baranovski at a picnic table in G. Ross Lord Park and beat him mercilessly when he refused to hand over cigarettes. Baranovski later died of his injuries.

Weiz's statement of claim alleges that the only two witnesses at trial who identified him as being at the scene were unreliable and had plotted to frame him.

One key Crown witness, Yaviore Lipschitz, was himself implicated by other witnesses as one of those who kicked Baranovski, but police ignored his role in the attack as well as his perjured statements and instead focused on Weiz, the statement of claim alleges.

"Police narrowed the focus of their investigation… to Mr. Weiz based on false evidence given to them by… Lipschitz," the statement says.

They did so despite knowing that "Lipschitz had confessed to at least five people that he had severely beaten Baranovski" and that "a plan had been formulated by some of the people who were present in the park to falsely blame Weiz for the crime," alleges the statement of claim, which contains allegations that have not been proven in court.

The court documents also allege "police intentionally misled the office of the Crown Attorney, [federal lawyer Graham] Cameron and the State of Israel as to the veracity of the contents of Lipschitz's sworn evidence in an effort to extradite Mr. Weiz when they knew or ought to have known that the only evidence against Weiz was from wholly unreliable sources."

In an interview, Weiz's lawyer at trial, Marie Henein, said the police investigation consisted of "negligent act upon negligent act upon negligent act."

She suggested public pressure for a quick resolution led police to charge Weiz, even though the witnesses who implicated him were caught in numerous lies and even though police uncovered enough information to indicate Weiz was being framed.

Henein likened the Weiz case to those involving Dennis Milgaard and Guy-Paul Morin, two suspects who were wrongly convicted of murder after police reacted to public pressure.

"In those cases, police got overwhelmed by the pressure and gave in to it," she said.

"As a community, we are entitled to expect police officers to act with the same standards, regardless of the person accused. As a community, that didn't happen and we suffered a loss for that and Mr. Weiz paid a heavy price."

Weiz, she said, spent four years in custody during what are important, formative years. "It's been overwhelming," she said, and Weiz, now back in Israel, suffers from nightmares and is finding it difficult to adjust to life as a free man. She said he is considering moving back to Canada.

Henein said from early on in the investigation, there was "a lot of attention that he was an Israeli and he was a soldier.

"I don't know why he was labelled an Israeli soldier… I was concerned about that walking into the trial. Somehow it implied he was a brutal person, and that's not true. It's not a fair characterization."

Henein also discounted police suggestions he "fled" to Israel when, she said, he had booked his flight well before the assault on Baranovski so as to continue his military service.

Weiz's claim for damages includes $5 million in general damages, $2 million to compensate for lost income and expenses and $2 million in punitive and aggravated damages.

The TPSB declined to comment on Weiz's claims, saying it doesn't discuss cases before the courts.

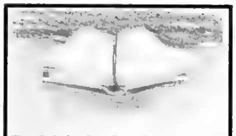
Parshah teaches importance of interpersonal relations

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

This Shabbat, we read the second parshah of the Torah, Noah, in the Book of Genesis. Of course, this section is best known for the episode of Noah and the flood that destroyed all of humanity. Yet, there is another significant and interesting incident depicted in this reading.



Rabbinic Reflections

Toward the end of the parshah, the story of the Tower of Babel is recorded. Everyone on earth spoke the same language, and the people decided to build a city with a tower that ascended to heaven. God witnessed this endeavour, was unhappy with humanity's hubris and decided to intervene to stop the plan. He confounded the people's speech so that they would begin speaking different languages and could not understand each other. He further scattered humanity throughout the whole world, thus making any further ambitious building project impossible.

This is a charming tale, one that explains the origins of the settling of the earth by human beings, as well as the origin of the multiplicity of human languages.

The rabbinic authors of the midrash, however, had another explanation for the need to bring the tower project to a halt. They suggested that, during the time the tower was being built, a brick was more precious in the eyes of the builders than was a human being. If a man fell while working and was killed, none took notice of this. If a brick dropped, though, people would bewail its loss, as it would take some time to prepare a replacement.

So intent were the builders upon accomplishing their work that a woman was not permitted to pause even when the pangs of childbirth began. While moulding bricks, she would give birth to her child, and tying it round her body in a sheet, she would go on moulding bricks.

It appears, then, that the midrashic writers were suggesting another reason the building project of Babel needed to be halted – the tower had become more important to those in charge of its construction than the lives of the people who were carrying out the work.

Are we not still affected by this problem? What is more important to us, our buildings or our interpersonal relations? Do we overlook human suffering as we strive to be in constant contact with work through our computers and cellphones? Apparently, we, too, are caught up in the "Babel" syndrome. We build and work; we strive for professional and business success.

Moreover, we find ourselves facing a striking irony: our generation, the generation most technically advanced and interconnected, is also a generation marked by striking loneliness and isolation. It seems the more technology makes us interdependent, the more alienated we are from each other as fellow human beings.

The renowned Jewish philosopher and mystic, Martin Buber, was engrossed in his studies one day when a young man came to see him. Buber spoke with him cordially and the young man departed. Later, Buber learned that the young man was about to be drafted into the army and he had wanted to consult with Buber on questions of life and death. Soon thereafter, the young man committed suicide. Buber felt responsible as he thought he had not listened to the young man as closely as he should have.

Subsequently Buber developed his philosophy of "I-Thou," in which he insisted that we never look upon another person as an "it," as an object for our use, but rather as a "thou," a precious and unique creation of God.

Each of us must determine which path to follow to achieve our fullest potential in relating to other human beings – the philosophy of the builders of Babel or that of Buber and "I-Thou."

The right thing to do

The Ten Commandments of Character,* by Joseph Telushkin, Random House, $38.00.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Difficult and complex ethical dilemmas confront us constantly. The following are a number of these moral questions that this clear-eyed, thoughtful and engaging book deals with:

- How honest should you be when you are asked to give a reference?
- How much assistance should you give your son with his college application essay?
- Is it wrong to receive a kidney from an executed prisoner in China?
- What should you do if your father begs you to end his life rather than allow him to descend into the hell of Alzheimer's?
- Should a brother give up part of his inheritance if his sister has children and considerable expenses and he doesn't?
- Should a dying woman reveal to her husband that their son is not really his?
- How can you love and respect parents if you neither love nor respect them?
- Is it immoral to declare bankruptcy and free oneself from debts incurred?
- Is stem-cell research, which relies on cells taken from fertilized eggs, immoral?

The book's author, Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, writes an ethical advice column for Beliefnet, a multi-faith Web-based community that focuses on matters of spirituality, morality, faith and belief. Not unexpectedly, he distils much of his advice from Jewish sources, old and new.

Responding cogently to 80 letters in this volume from people facing personal problems, Rabbi Telushkin cites a wide variety of sources. The issues he addresses are grouped under nine headings: family, children, friends, animals, work, money, medical ethics, everyday dilemmas and community.

Among his "Ten Commandments of character," the author includes common sense. He asserts that Mahatma Gandhi, a hero for many, lacked this attribute. How else can one explain his widely publicized advice to the soldiers of England in the spring of 1940 – at a time when Hitler's troops were conquering country after country in Europe – to lay down their weapons and let Hitler occupy England and all the countries Germany had invaded?

"Had Gandhi, and not Churchill, led England, the result would have been that almost every Jew in the world would have been murdered by the Nazis, and hundreds of millions of other people would have been forced to live under the most totalitarian and brutal regime in history," Rabbi Telushkin writes.

How should one handle a telemarketing phone call? Perhaps, the rabbi says, instead of slamming down the receiver, you could be courteous and say to the caller, "You really don't have to give me your whole presentation. I'm not interested in buying your product. But I do hope you have greater success with others."

After doing this a few times himself, writes Rabbi Telushkin, "I felt good because I had been kind. I also felt a measure of compassion for the person who has to inflict herself on others by making these calls. As is often the case, doing the right thing for another turned out to be the right thing for me, too."

In response to another letter from someone who was remorseful about passing on rumours, the author makes it clear that having your reputation as a good person destroyed is somewhat like being killed. That's why we call slandering or libelling "character assassination."

He suggests that the next time you hear a nasty rumour about someone, apply the Golden Rule: If somebody heard such a rumour about you, how carefully would you want them to check it out before he shared it? And if he passed it on without checking it out, how impressed would you be by his defence that he meant well?

When Rabbi Telushkin is uncertain, he solicits answers from the chat room formed around his column. In the end, he confesses that writing his column has repeatedly reminded him of an old truth: "Often the hardest thing in life is not knowing the right thing, but knowing the right thing to do."

Speaking of teachers…

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

At the beginning of Chapter 2 of his Laws of Studying Torah, Maimonides writes that a city that fails to provide for a Jewish primary school should be "excommunicated" until arrangements have been made to provide teachers for local students. If arrangements are not made, the city should be "destroyed." Some versions of Rambam's text substitute "excommunicated" for "destroyed," as the dispute hangs by the correct reading of a single Hebrew letter in his original manuscripts.

Whichever fate awaits this unfortunate community, Maimonides' rationale is quite clear: "The world exists only through the merit of the mouths of children [studying Torah]."

How many of us, in our techno-corporate world, view the world's fate as being contingent on the Judaic strivings of our children? How many of us perceive Torah as the sustaining force in our march to grades, lucre, promotions, plaques and perpetuity?

And yet, despite these Maimonidean exhortations, the role of the educator remains, at the worst of times, uncomfortably akin to, shall we say, prostitution – a profession that is temporarily of great importance to others and solicited to fulfil an urgent need, but also one that is soon forgotten and never to be recommended as a vocation for one's children.

As parents, we expect and desire our children to have nominal respect for teachers, and yet how many times have we heard conversations in which the teacher is publicly derided by a mother or a father in front of their children?

Any attempts at damage control by somehow urging the kids to honour and defer to the teacher are quickly subsumed by children, who in their infinite capacity to discern and record hypocrisy, understand this to be mere window dressing for their parents' disregard for, and dismissal of, the instructor.

The need to take accurate account of the educator of one's child while at the same time fostering a basic respect for that individual is not an easy task to achieve. Children's feelings and perceptions of their teachers need to be validated, and teachers are, like all other human beings, certainly not perfect.

Nonetheless, there are discreet ways of handling situations, and there is language that is appropriate to the task. Do we help our kids by venting our own frustrations at a teacher in impulsively indecorous language, which, though we may wish to take it back in a moment of post facto calm and rationality, will not easily be erased from the minds of our children?

I have noticed that many people often speak differently to very wealthy people than they do to others, both in inflection and language. There is an unmistakable tone of deference and subtle caution in even the briefest of such conversations.

What a fascinating way to approach talking to, and about, teachers, who, if Maimonides is correct, are surely in charge of riches beyond compare.

Israeli blogs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

What do you remember best from your last trip to Israel? The newscast you overheard on the radio or that conversation you had with a taxi driver? If it's the driver and if you'd like to get a taste of what Israelis are saying right now, then it's time to check out their blogs.

Last week, I told you about "blogs" – or Web logs – a type of online diary that allows people to share their thoughts on issues big and small. Many bloggers like to troll the Internet in search of interesting articles that they reprint on their own sites with their own commentary – kind of like a one-person Reader's Digest. While some blogs can be exasperating soapboxes and a forum for uncensored language, others deliver insight that you can't find anywhere else.

Of course, the Internet is very well served by Israeli media in both English (The Jerusalem Post [http://jpost.com], Ha'aretz [http://www.haaretzdaily.com]) and in Hebrew (Maariv [http://images.maariv.co.il], Galei Tzahal [http://glz.msn.co.il/glz]) and many others. But to find what Israelis in Ra'anana, Afula or Eilat are saying, read their blogs (or Hebrew, bloggim).

Allison Kaplan Sommer is the person behind "An Unsealed Room: A Window on Life in Israel." When I last checked her room, Allison was weighing in on the controversy over the fact that Rona Ramon, widow of the Challenger astronaut Ilan Ramon, who is currently still living in Houston, is requesting U.S. citizenship for herself and the kids. "I say: Leave this poor woman alone… While I'd like them to come back to Israel, and think it would be wonderful if they did, I can understand why she might prefer for them not to be raised in this small country where they would be living symbols of a national tragedy – and not just kids." Allison also bemoaned the end of the Jewish holidays ("Oh, yeah, and today is the day everybody goes on a diet. On the radio, a nutritionist is saying that the average Israeli gains seven-nine pounds over the holidays. I'm there. I feel like I'm detoxing from food.") [http://allisonkaplansommer.blogmosis.com/]

Like most Israeli bloggers, Adrian of ExpatEgghead writes about violence and peace in his country. "Why are those Palestinians who are prepared to work toward a solution unable to control or neutralize what seems an alarming escalation of activities of the fanatical fundamentalist elements?" Then he adds a melancholy note, "Oh, for a quiet life. Why can't Israel be as boring as Belgium?" [http://expategghead.blog spot.com]

If you, like Adrian, long for a break from the bad news, check out the Good News from Israel blog [http://www.newsoftheday.com/israel/blog.html]. Did you know that a scientist from Hebrew University is the winner of the first Alzheimer's Disease Drug Discovery Award? Or that an Israeli girl has won the European champion of the western riding event for youth in the 14th European quarter horse championships? Or that voice-mail technology was developed in Israel? (I suppose that can be classified as good news.)

There are plenty of other English language blogs from Israel on the Web and they're quite easy to find. Just go the blogs above, where you will find links to sites such as Alisa In Wonderland, Civax, Entre Nous, Jennifer Not a Fish, Points of Departure, Sha!, TalG, The View From Here and This Normal Life.

To get a taste of what Israelis are blogging to each other in Hebrew, check out the Israeli Blogs & Journal Index, where you can find more than 100 links to different sites [http://ilblogs.djyaniv.com/]. Or easier still, click on the following link to go to a random Hebrew blog [http://makeashorterlink.com/?E24912446]. Remember, if you have trouble reading Hebrew online, then download the free Mozilla browser that does a great job of displaying Hebrew [http://www.mozillaorg/].

I wasn't surprised to find blogs in Hebrew, but I did a double-take when I came across some in the language of Sholom Aleichem and Mendele Mocher Sforim. You can practice the mama-loshen thanks to the efforts of Sholem Berger [http://www.israblog.co.il/blogread.asp?blog=5801], Katla Kanya [http://www.israblog.co.il/blogread.asp?blog=1782] and Der Chasid Noam Starik [http://www.israblog.co.il/blogread.asp?blog=7203].

Come to think of it, perhaps I shouldn't be surprised about these sites. "Blog" does sound like a Yiddish word, doesn't it?

Just A Second Shop benefits from new partnership

Thanks to a unique partnership between UJA Federation's Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (JVPF) and the Just A Second Shop operated by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), an important landmark in Toronto's Jewish community has been revitalized.

Located at York Downs and Bathurst, the Just A Second Shop (JASS) provides many benefits to the Jewish community and those who are served by JF&CS. All net proceeds of the JASS are used to send underprivileged Jewish children to summer camps. In addition, many clients of JF&CS and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) who require financial assistance become eligible to be part of the store's voucher program which, in turn, allows them to shop for free. JASS also creates employment opportunities for a number of part-time staffers who may have trouble finding jobs elsewhere.

Members of the Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund - who first identify, and then invest in worthy community programs - recently decided that there were many opportunities to enhance the store's success.

With that in mind, members of JVPF - spearheaded by Peter Brown, Glenn Graff and Ron Prosserman - teamed up with Just A Second Shop to initiate a number of changes, which applied business principles to a charitable venture, so that more families could be helped. Those changes include extended store hours for the public's convenience, better quality merchandise, and streamlining store procedures to make the shopping experience at JASS as pleasant as possible.

"This is a tremendous win-win opportunity," says Brown. "Local residents love to shop in the store for the incredible bargains and all clients of JF&CS benefit. By implementing basic business disciplines we believe the number of people being helped can grow exponentially."

"We like to be involved in hands-on projects where we can see the benefits in our own community, where we can actually make a difference." says Graff. "We are also always looking to improve the quality of the clothing donations so that all customers enjoy a better shopping experience. We're so pleased to be part of this amazing partnership."

"The partnership with UJA Federation and its Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund has provided the agency with opportunities to enhance the shop and become more creative and the ultimate benefactors are the customers and the clients," says Fay Geitzhals, supervisor at JF&CS. "The Venture group has joined with us providing their expertise in business with our expertise in community work, and this is proving to be a successful combination. I am very excited about the future possibilities for the Just a Second Shop."

Bay Street Meets Wall Street

A visit with former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani was one of the highlights of the recent "Bay Street Meets Wall Street" hosted by UJA Federation's Finance Division. The 2-day trip to NYC included 25 of UJA Federation's Major Gift donors. The trip, chaired by David Goodman and Seth Mersky, gave participants the opportunity to meet with a number of interesting personalities including Giuliani, as well as American birthright israel philanthropist Michael Steinhardt; and Alon Pinkus, Israel Consul General to New York.

Strong turnout expected for March of the Living

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Organizers of this year's March of the Living (MOL) expect dramatically increased participation, with a sharp drop in the price of the trip.

The price reduction is motivated by an urgent need to encourage increased participation because there are fewer Holocaust survivors to accompany MOL members.

Last year, participation in MOL cost $5,500, while this year the cost has dropped to just $3,600. As a result, between 300 to 400 students from across Canada are expected to be part of the March of the Living from April 14-27, 2004. Approximately 60 adults including survivors, educators, religious leaders, and other qualified staff will accompany the Canadian contingent - high school students who come from a variety of religious and educational backgrounds.

Toronto's Rachel Shiff, a member of MOL 2003, visits the Treblinka Concentration Camp.

The lower prices were made possible by MOL International, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, UIA Federations Canada and private funding.

"The excitement and enthusiasm about this year's March is quite high," says Toronto MOL chair, Dr. Irv Gottesman. "People are going back to Israel in droves again; just look at the incredible numbers of birthright israel participants. There have been so many inquiries about this trip; we're expecting it to be a banner year. We're also thrilled to see the price come down so much making this important journey available to so many more Jewish teens."

Toronto MOL 2003 participants dance together at the Tikochyn Synagogue in Poland.

University age students are eligible for Anguish to Hope which will depart in December 2003. For more information log on to www.anguishtohope.org

On April 18, the Canadian MOL contingent, chaired by Hilda Cohen, will meet up with thousands of Jewish youth from Israel, U.S.A., Mexico, France, Great Britain, South Africa, South America, Australia, the former Soviet Union, Hungary and Romania, to share a once-in-a-lifetime experience when they march the three-kilometre distance separating Auschwitz from Birkenau, the largest concentration camp complex built by the Nazis during World War II.

The March takes place on Yom Hashoah – Holocaust Remembrance Day.

From Poland, the young people will proceed to Israel and on April 26 – Yom Ha'atzmaut - they will join with Israelis to celebrate Israel's 56th Independence Day.

"The itinerary looks tremendous, with great programs set for both Israel and Poland," says Gottesman. "The time to go on The March of the Living is now. Our youngsters must learn from these survivors who stand next to the students - quite often on the actual spot - as they recount their personal experiences of the Holocaust. There is nothing like this experience and soon these opportunities will be gone."

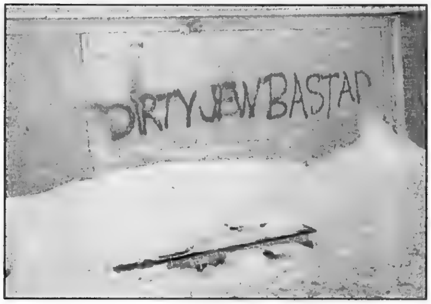
Experts concerned about the popularity of anti-Semitism today

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Anti-Semitism today is more broadly based and more widespread than at any time since the Second World War, according to two of Canada's most prominent experts on the subject.

"The number of anti-Semitic incidents worldwide over the last three years (dating from the intensification of Palestinian violence against Israel) has not been this high since after the end of World War II," says Manuel Prutschi, National Director of Community Relations, Canadian Jewish Congress. "It's more prevalent than ever because, while it used to come predominantly from the far right, today it also comes from the left, from militant Islamists and from Arab Nationalists."



Anti-Semitism has become a popular activity in today's society.

"There is a palpable fear among many Jews and a feeling of vulnerability and marginalization because of how commonplace anti-Semitic comments and behaviour have become, much the same as people described it in pre-war Europe," says Dr. Karen Mock, Executive Director, Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

The experts are also concerned with the phenomenon of what has been called "the new anti-Semitism," which blurs the line between criticism of Israel and denigration of Jews.

"We see that line crossed regularly between legitimate political criticism and anti-Semitism," says Mock. "It is particularly upsetting to see it happen increasingly in schools, on campuses, and in discussions with many so-called human rights activists, leaving their Jewish colleagues silenced, marginalized, and feeling increasingly disillusioned and vulnerable."

"Essentially," says Prutschi, "anti-Semitism is the intent to deny the Jewish people its equal membership in the human family, and - once the State of Israel was created – to deny the Jewish State its rightful place in the community of nations. The assault on Israel is another manifestation of the same age-old anti-Semitism."

For the naysayers who insist that concern about anti-Semitism is overstated, the numbers vehemently disagree. There has been a steady rise in reported incidents of overt anti-Semitism over the last few years.

"And the severity of the incidents is getting worse too," says Mock. "The Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Anti-Semitism and Racism at the University of Tel Aviv annually reports on documented anti-Semitic incidents in 27 countries worldwide, including Canada. The trends are clear, indicating that there is reality behind this so-called rhetoric."

"I think there is a climate of discourse today that has made it possible for all kinds of anti-Semitism – both verbal and physical – to take place," adds Prutschi. "The 'new anti-Semitism' is not new – the standard themes have remained constant for over 2,000 years. One of those is the libel of a world Jewish conspiracy most recently pronounced by the Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, who said that Jews rule the world by proxy and get others to die for them."

In his opening address to the recent 57-nation Organization of the Islamic Conference summit, Mohamad, referring to Jews, stated: "We are up against a people who think ... they invented and successfully promoted socialism, communism, human rights and democracy so that persecuting them would appear to be wrong, so they may enjoy equal rights with others. With these they have now gained control of the most powerful countries and they, this tiny community, have become a world power."

According to Prutschi, it is absolutely essential that this type of anti-Semitism be expunged from the mainstream.

"Leaders in public life have to condemn – unequivocally – any manifestation of anti-Semitism immediately. People need to see, right away, that this kind of behaviour is not acceptable and will not be tolerated."

Fighting anti-Semitism is a key area to which funds from UJA Federation Campaign 2004 will be directed.

Finding beauty in a legacy of loss

By WENDY LAMPERT

Mindy Weisel spent her childhood trying to make her parents happy.

The internationally recognized artist and author told 200 women at the UJA Federation Lion of Judah Luncheon last week that, as a child, she never really felt a wide range of emotions. "None of my feelings were as bad as those who survived the death camps," she noted.

"My life as a child of survivors was about trying to be everything to my parents, to bring them beauty and joy," Weisel said. "I tried desperately to erase the sadness I inherited."

Weisel is the author of Daughters of Absence: Transforming a Legacy of Loss, a book examining how creative women changed the inheritance of their parents' Holocaust ordeals into beautiful artistic expressions. Her art hangs in collections around the world, including The Israel Museum and the U.S. Capitol Building.

"Like most survivors' daughters, I really didn't know how I felt about anything. I buried my feelings until I couldn't any longer." At the age of 28, Weisel went into therapy to deal with those feelings.

What she found were many questions. "How could I learn to be happy knowing what my parents went through?" she said. She also began to think about how people who face tragedy continue with their lives, and how they find hope.

"We are living in a time when we are being faced with so many challenges and tragedies and insecurities and anxieties," Weisel said. The answer, she noted, is to find and create beauty.

Painting and writing have transformed the tragedies of her parents into something meaningful.

"Painting became my form of prayer, of dance, of life itself," she said. "Only in the studio was my authentic voice available to me."

Weisel told her audience that everyone has the ability and the responsibility to create beauty in the face of tragedy and loss.

"Every single one of you sitting in this room is creating something beautiful. You are creating hope. You are allowing people to hold on to something," she said. "Even in the worst and hardest of times, it's within us to create our own beauty. Human nature makes us capable of this."

Noting that several generations of women from a single family were in the room, Weisel praised the ability of women to develop intergenerational commitments to the Jewish community.

"You are a force for good," she said. "Your commitment of time and energy is so necessary."

Lion of Judah, a division of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, honours women who make a yearly contribution of $5,000 to the UJA Federation annual campaign. To date, Women's Campaign & Advocacy has raised $4.7 million, helping to propel Campaign 2004 to the $41 million mark.

Farber honoured by Police

Bernie Farber, Executive Director, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, was recently accepted as an associate member of the Ontario Chiefs of Police for his work with police services over the years. Farber was nominated by York Region Police Services Chief Armand La Barge. The chief and 17 officers from York Region recently took a tour of the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre at the Lipa Green Building in Toronto. "I am particularly honoured," says Farber, "because this is not an affirmation of my work, but of the work we've done in the Jewish community to better our relations with the police."

BJCC paid parking policy may be changing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's (BJCC) 10-month experiment with paid parking may be coming to an end.

For the past few weeks, the gate that enclosed 50 choice parking spaces adjacent to the centre's Leah Posluns Theatre has been up for much – though not all – of the day, allowing BJCC members access to the lot without paying the $2 fee.

"We're reviewing the parking policy as we speak," said BJCC executive director Sherry Kulman. "The arm is up much more frequently, let's put it that way."

The paid parking policy came under fire last winter from some BJCC members, particularly seniors, who said those on fixed incomes found the payment too onerous leading them to park in the overflow lot at the south end of the BJCC grounds. Some found the walk to the facility, especially in winter, a disincentive to attending, and were incensed when their trek took them past the mostly empty pay lot.

Kulman said the BJCC has responded to members' needs by implementing several changes to its parking policy.

It has added about 10 new handicapped spots adjacent to the building on the west side, and it has eased congestion in the rest of the parking lot when the arm is down by permitting parents with children in day care to use their access cards to open the gate of the paid parking lot. The latter move has freed up parking spaces in the rest of the lot, Kulman said.

The parking arm, though up at various times of the day, will remain down in the evenings and at other unspecified times, Kulman said.

"We're piloting this and we will see how it is going. If circumstances change, we'll evaluate it at that time," she added.

In addition to the 50 spots in the paid parking lot, the centre has 200 spots on the west side of the building, plus 400 spots in the south overflow lot, for a total of 650.

When the paid parking policy was implemented, BJCC officials were hoping to add up to $30,000 a year to the centre's revenues.

JF&CS welcomes new executive director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After 25 years in academic life, Ron Levin moved from Edmonton to Toronto this summer to become executive director of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), replacing longtime executive director Gordon Wolfe, who retired.

Ron Levin

Levin said the position intrigued him professionally because of the agency's innovative, multi-faceted approach. "Most of the time, organizations are more single-focused. Children's aid societies [usually only] provide children's services. It's a more segmented system.

"At other places, [when] you have to refer to another agency, there's a discontinuity. People unfortunately get lost."

He said JF&CS, which acts as a children's aid society while also providing other social services, has "the ideal kind of arrangement," because it meets many needs under one umbrella. Its counterpart in Edmonton, for example, serving a Jewish community of 5,000, has no child-welfare component, he said.

A Winnipeger who moved to Edmonton in 1971, Levin, 57, also has close family, including a son, in Toronto, making the move an even more appealing choice.

The Jewish aspect of the agency was of interest as well. A past president of Beth Israel Congregation in Edmonton, Levin – the son of Holocaust survivors who was born in Poland and immigrated to Canada via Israel as a child – also served as a member of Edmonton's chevrah kadishah, or burial society. Although he was affiliated with an Orthodox congregation there, he describes himself as an "aspiringly observant person."

Speaking about six weeks after he arrived, Levin said he was still involved in a "self-orientation" process as well as the day-to-day details of his job.

He said the JF&CS board has identified three major areas for the agency to focus on: prevention and wellness, including early-intervention supportive programs; "capacity building" in terms of delivering services more effectively; and revenue sources.

The agency has three offices, and about half its annual budget is related to child welfare, Levin said. Because of cutbacks in government funding, "all the agencies have a shortfall of funds." Some of that is offset by funding from United Way and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, he said.

"It's a very complex organization… I'm trying to discover how I can add value to the organization. I'm hoping I can bring another perspective because of my academic background."

Levin was head of the Edmonton division of the University of Calgary's faculty of social work for a total of 15 years, running its bachelor of social work and executive master of social work programs at its satellite location on the University of Alberta campus. He developed the MSW program.

At the same time, he remained involved in clinical social work, among other things spending five years as part-time director of social work for a rehabilitation hospital.

During his third sabbatical, in the 2001-2002 academic year, Levin developed a course on spirituality and social work, and started to think about what he wanted to do following his "payback" year of teaching after the sabbatical.

His wife, a former public school principal, had already retired, but he said that when he received a call "out of the blue" about the position at JF&CS, it sounded more appealing than retirement. "It piqued my interest."

Jewish life in Georgia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TBILISI, Georgia — In the open plaza directly in front of Tbilisi's main synagogue, a handful of kippah-clad men sit around on two benches, smoking, shmoozing, watching the world go by.

It's a typical scene of idleness in the Republic of Georgia: acquaintances come and go, making chit-chat and spending some time watching a clutch of workers nearby, only to be replaced by others with time on their hands.

To the left of the synagogue's main doors, a small group of workers is busy constructing a memorial. Asked who is being memorialized, synagogue member Yakov Rabinovich says with a shrug of the shoulders, "We'll find out after they finish."

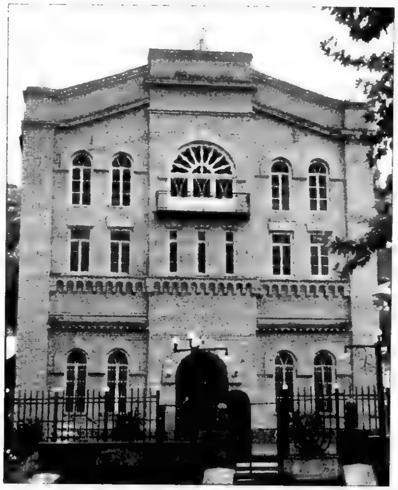
The purpose of the open-air booths to the right of the synagogue's entrance, however, is well known to the congregant. It's where the community's shochet performs the ritual slaughter of animals that provides kosher meat to the local Jewish community.

The centre of Jewish life in Tbilisi, the Synagogue of Georgian Jews has undergone extensive renovations in the last few years, making it a real community showpiece. Unlike the ramshackle buildings that are common elsewhere in the Georgian capital, with their peeling paint, missing chunks of masonry and rusted iron railings, the synagogue is in immaculate condition. A lovely iron fence with inlaid golden Stars of David sets the shul apart from the street, and the front of the building features new and level interlocking stone – unusual in Tbilisi, where it appears little effort has gone into upgrading the dilapidated infrastructure.

Inside the shul, worshippers have two sanctuaries to choose from. Upstairs is a grand hall, with beautiful crystal chandeliers, an ornate wooden bimah and walls painted in elaborate, decorative motifs in the Georgian tradition. Services are also held in the sanctuary on the main level.

The synagogue renovations were completed thanks to the financial support of expatriate Georgian Jews living in the United States, who also subsidize the community's free Jewish school and community offices.

Most of Georgia's Jews have left in the last 30 years, leaving about 10,000 people. At one point in the early 1970s, the community numbered more than 100,000.



Tbilisi's main synagogue.

But with relaxed emigration in the former Soviet Union and later under an independent Georgian government, most left for Israel, the United States, Russia and Belgium.

Georgia, which lies in the mountainous south Caucasus region between the Black and Caspian seas, has been home to a Jewish community for 26 centuries, likely making it the oldest Diaspora community in the world.

Surprisingly, few among the congregation hanging around on a hot August day can relate the historical reasons for the community's presence in Georgia.

"We're here and that's what we know," said one congregant, though another was aware that the Jews' arrival coincided with the destruction of the First Temple in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Avimelech Rosenblath

Ask Guram Batiashvili the same question and the author/playwright heads over to the crowded bookshelf that fills one wall in his elegantly appointed salon. He pulls down a tome on Georgian history and points out the most commonly accepted view, which is that Jews fleeing Nebuchadnezzar's Babylonian armies around 586 BCE came to Georgia and settled in Tzekhta, only a few miles from Tbilisi. Another view suggests the Jews arrived even earlier, following the Assyrian destruction of the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 770 BCE. Still others link the Jewish arrival to the destruction of the Second Temple by Roman armies in the first century.

Speaking through an interpreter, Batiashvili, publisher of Menorah, a Jewish biweekly newspaper, said Jews worked as farmers and traders "like everyone else." Nevertheless, they "tried to stay separate from the Georgian people, with only a little interaction with other Jews in other countries. They lived here alone."

Tbilisi eventually became the centre for the largest concentration of Jews, but other communities could be found in Gori (the birthplace of Josef Stalin), Kutaisi and Ahkaltsikhe. To the east, in Muslim Azerbaijan, Jews also maintained communities and became known as the region's "mountain Jews."

During the Soviet era, the condition of the Jews varied. Toward the end of the Stalinist period, in the early 1950s, synagogues were closed, some Jews were exiled to Siberia and the rabbi was imprisoned, Batiashvili said.

A government laureate in literature, Batiashvili said life under the Soviet regime was not too harsh, except for the late Stalinist period. The Georgian brand of communism was not as severe as Russia's and after the Stalinist period, "it was easier for the Jewish religion."

Beginning in the 1970s, immigration restrictions were lifted. Seeking freedom and hoping to improve their economic lot, many of the community's Jews left, mostly for Israel and the United States, Batiashvili said.

In the 1990s, following the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the last wave of emigration occurred, bringing the total number of Jews who had left in that 30-year period to 80 per cent. Today, New York is home to 4,000

'90s were difficult period for Georgian community

Georgian Jews, the largest expatriate community outside of Israel.

The 1990s were a particularly difficult period for the Georgian community – as it was for the wider society. Political upheaval, war and economic stagnation hurt the community's prospects, Batiashvili said.

Today, he said, "most remaining Jews want to live here. Some want to go, but they cannot sell their houses." Others are concerned they won't be able to find work in Israel.

Guram Batiashvili

A variety of agencies serve the local community. The Joint Distribution Committee operates Chesed Eliyahu, an agency that provides dinner every day for 240 needy people. In early August, a new "campus" opened that houses a variety of Jewish organizations, including Chesed Eliyahu, Hillel, a Jewish information centre, Menorah, Yonat Hashalom (a Jewish/Georgian dance troupe) and a cultural centre, he said.

The building was financed by a contribution from the Posner family in Pittsburgh. A local businessman, Badri Patarkatsishvili, who has interests in construction and the media and has been linked to Russian oligarchs, is also one of the community's major benefactors.

The Sochnut (Jewish Agency) operates in Georgia as does an office of the World Congress of Georgian Jews, of which Batiashvili is a member. The congress offers cultural, religious, youth and women's programs.

Chabad Lubavitch also has a presence there. In January 2002, the movement opened offices in central Tbilisi and it now operates a kindergarten and has plans to open a school as well. The offices feature a computer centre and Internet café. Last June, about 100 children attended a two-week day camp at Tsemi, near Bakurian. And last spring's Passover seders attracted 500 people at the Sarajishvili restaurant.

Back in the old city of Tbilisi, not far from the community's main synagogue, is the office of Rabbi Avimelech Rosenblath, a spokesperson for the Religious Congregation of Jews of Georgia.

Expanding on the exile story, Rabbi Rosenblath says the ancient community was supplemented in the 19th and 20th centuries by immigration from Iran and from neighbouring Azerbaijan. He estimates there are still 20,000 Jews in Azerbaijan, mostly in the capital Baku and in Kuba, but the Georgian community doesn't have much contact with them. Nearby Dagestan is home to a few Jews, while small communities can also be found in Armenia to the south and Chechnya to the north.

Rabbi Rosenblath agrees with Batiashvili's assessment that communism in Georgia wasn't as bad as in other parts of the Soviet Union. Even during difficult times, the synagogue remained open. Today, the Synagogue of Georgian Jews regularly attracts 80 to 100 for Shabbat services and crowds of around 400 during the High Holy Days. A second house of worship, the Ashkenazi Synagogue, has a smaller congregation.

Tiferet Zvi, a tuition-free day school, educates more than 80 youngsters from grades 1 to 11. The school is subsidized by donations from abroad. Classes are taught in Georgian, but students also learn Hebrew, Russian and English. Rabbi Rosenblath says many older Georgian Jews don't have a strong command of Hebrew, but the younger generation is growing up with it.

Thanks to the emigration of the last 30 years, most Georgian Jews have relatives in Israel and therefore have close ties to the Jewish state, the rabbi said.

Batiashvili said the government of Georgia has good relations with Israel, attributable in part to the good relations between the Jewish and broader Georgian communities.

Another reason for such good ties was described at a forum hosted by the U.S. National Intelligence Council a few years ago. Discussing the Turkey-Israel/South Caucasus-Central Asia nexus, John Daly of the Middle East Institute said Georgia sits in a highly strategic location where Europe and Asia meet. A pipeline to carry Caspian crude oil to western markets could traverse Georgia and exit through Turkey. Furthermore, Georgia lies directly south of Chechnya, where Islamic insurgents linked to Al Qaeda have tied down the Russian army for years.

Interior of Tbilisi synagogue. [Paul Lungen photos]

South Caucasus countries look to Turkey and Israel for their experience in tackling insurgencies and for being part of strategic alliance with the United States. Israel and Turkey both have great potential for expanding their influence in the region, Daly said.

The United States, for its part, has sent army instructors to train the Georgian military in counter-terrorism tactics, employed in the Pankisi Gorge near Chechnya, which is considered a redoubt of Islamic militants in the region.

Memorial recalls Fackenheim

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Toward the end of his life, philosopher Emil Fackenheim worried that he would only be remembered for his admonition that after the Holocaust, the Jewish people must survive, and, in a phrase that has become famous, not give Hitler posthumous victories.

But a memorial service at Holy Blossom Temple last week showed that he will also be remembered for his tremendous scholarship, his intellect, his writing and perhaps most of all, his personality.

The low-key, very personal event included reminiscences by Rabbi Dow Marmur, former senior rabbi of Holy Blossom; Henrietta Chesnie, a community activist and former president of Holy Blossom; Michael Morgan, a professor of philosophy and Jewish studies at Indiana University; and Mary Jo Leddy, an activist for social justice and good relations between Christians and Jews.

All had had personal relationships with Fackenheim and spoke of him with humour and affection.

Morgan said Fackenheim will be remembered as one of the greatest theologians of recent history. "He had a sensitivity and a commitment to scholarship and literature," and he was always engaged in an "intense and honest search for truth," Morgan said.

While he studied in Berlin, Aberdeen and Toronto, the two greatest intellectual periods of his life were in Toronto, where he formulated what he called his 614th commandment – that Jews were obligated to survive after the Holocaust – and where he wrote about tikkun olam, to mend the world, Morgan said.

"Toronto was his intellectual home, and he returned here when he needed revitalization."

Morgan said Fackenheim had two passions that he felt all Jews must share: the Holocaust and God. He believed that "there is no healing – the scars must remain. But there can be mending."

His other passion, Morgan said, was the work of German philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel.

Chesnie described how popular Fackenheim's classes were and how effective a teacher he was.

"He made us face the particularity of Auschwitz," she remembered.

Making aliyah in 1982 was fully in tune with his belief in the 614th commandment, she said. "He was a passionate speaker for the defence of Israel."

Rabbi Marmur said Fackenheim paid a heavy price for living out his convictions by living in Israel, where he had difficulty adjusting and received little recognition.

He praised Fackenheim as a staunch defender of Reform rights in Israel.

His concentration on the lessons of the Holocaust were "both his strength and his weakness," Rabbi Marmur said. "He had trouble getting past it."

Nevertheless, he continued, "it is our task to make sure that his message is heart. What he taught, must be learned."

Chazzan Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim.

BIALIK RETREAT: Grade 6 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School recently participated in a retreat at Camp George. The purpose of this program is to develop team cohesiveness through activities integrated with Jewish themes. COMMUNITY COMMEMORATION OF KRISTALLNACHT

"Designing Sacred Space: Memorializing the Holocaust"

Saturday, November 8 – 8:00pm

Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst Street, Toronto

DANIEL LIBESKIND, internationally renowned and influential award-winning architect, will join the community in commemorating the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht, when on November 9-10, 1938 a massive, coordinated attack was carried out against Jews throughout Germany and Austria. Mr. Libeskind, born in Poland to Holocaust survivors, will discuss his aims and objectives and the particular challenges he faces when designing buildings to memorialize the Holocaust.

Eugenics movement in U.S. led to Holocaust: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Readers may be shocked to learn that the pernicious idea of the master race, fiendishly perfected by Nazi Germany with horrific results, originated in the United States.

According to Edwin Black, the Washington-based author of War Against the Weak (Four Walls Eight Windows), the concept was enshrined and promoted by the eugenics movement, the science of controlled breeding.

Its objective, the creation of a superior, white, Nordic race, was supported by the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Institution and backed by some of the most respected scientists in the United States.

In an interview to promote his book, Black, an American journalist whose previous work was IBM and the Holocaust, condemned eugenics as a pseudo science.

It legitimized race hatred and anti-Semitism, encouraged restrictive immigration policies in the United States, Canada and elsewhere and laid the groundwork for the Holocaust.

In Mein Kampf, Adolf Hitler displayed a sound knowledge of American eugenic ideology. He wrote: "There is today one state in which at least weak beginnings toward a better conception of [immigration] are noticeable. Of course, it is not our model German republic, but the United States."

Rudolf Hess, Hitler's deputy, went one step further. "National Socialism," he observed, "is nothing but applied biology."

Establishing a scientific rationale for persecution, proponents of eugenics sought to "cleanse" America of the so-called "unfit." They included Afro-Americans, Jews, the infirm, the poor, non-Nordic immigrants and Indians.

Under their nefarious influence, 27 U.S. states subjected 60,000 Americans to coercive sterilization procedures, and the U.S. Supreme Court endorsed eugenics as a national policy.

Black, the son of Holocaust survivors, says the eugenics movement exploited and fanned existing racial and ethnic conflicts all around the world.

"First came racial animus and then came racial science," he said.

Ironically, eugenicists considered themselves liberals who thought they were improving society, he noted.

"Some of America's best and brightest reformers were eugenicists."

Canada was the first country after the United States to adapt eugenics.

The director of a psychiatric hospital in Toronto supported sterilization as a means by which to staunch criminality.

In 1928, Alberta passed the Sexual Sterilization Act, and in 1933, British Columbia enacted similar legislation.

Tommy Douglas, a future leader of the left-of-centre New Democratic Party, was an early devotee. He recanted after visiting Germany in the 1930s.

Black speculates that Canada's harsh immigration laws, which restricted the flow of Jewish refugees from Germany and Nazi-occupied Europe, were influenced by the eugenics movement.

He was drawn to the topic while researching IBM and the Holocaust.

As he writes: "I finally came to see that eugenics was a life and death proposition for Europe's Jews. Yet I still didn't realize that this bizarre cult of Nazi race science was originally linked to America."

But as he explored the subject, he grew to understand that the overarching Nazi principle of Nordic superiority was hatched not in Germany but in the United States.

"Eugenics was a precursor to the Holocaust," he said.

Academics seek to create an Israel advocacy group

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A group of university professors is planning to launch an organization to counter the upsurge of anti-Israel feelings on Canadian campuses.

They are working to establish Canadian Academics for Peace in Israel and the Middle East, said Ed Morgan, a University of Toronto law professor and chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

The idea was prompted by two relatively recent events – the troubles surrounding the visit of American scholar Daniel Pipes to York University last January and the disturbances at Concordia University over Benjamin Netanyahu's visit last September.

Group would help counter negative image of Israel on campus

Morgan and several colleagues, including York University historian Irving Abella and University of Toronto philosopher Kenneth Green, have formed a steering committee to draft a proposal for the organization.

"The Jewish community has committed substantial resources to student-oriented programming through Hillel, and we feel that the atmosphere on campus can also be improved through faculty-oriented initiatives," said Morgan, a specialist in international law who was born in the United States.

The group has applied to the new Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy for seed funding and has received support and encouragement, as well as a commitment of administrative assistance, from Hillel of Greater Toronto and CJC.

"We do not conceive of this proposal as initiating another Jewish community advocacy group," said Morgan. "It has a relatively specialized function, and is limited to university-oriented activities."

He believes the community should be at the forefront of efforts to ensure that Canadian universities remain open and safe places for discussions about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Once Canadian Academics for Peace in Israel and the Middle East gets off the ground, Morgan wants to start a magazine dealing with Mideast issues, sponsor summer internships for students, hold an annual conference and host visiting lecturers.

The organization, Morgan said, would be open to all academics, Jewish and non-Jewish, who are interested in dialogue on "issues of concern" regarding Israel, the Palestinians and the Arab world.

If established, Canadian Academics for Peace in Israel and the Middle East would supplant the now-defunct Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East, founded in 1978 and disbanded in 1992 as "a cost-saving measure," said David Goldberg, the research director of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Morgan said Israel's image on campuses is poor for a number of reasons.

"It is hard to pinpoint any one policy of the Israeli government or one point in the Arab-Israeli conflict that is the catalyst. One must keep in mind, however, that the state of world politics is such that a pro-Israel argument or position often gets translated as a pro-American argument or position.

"It is safe to say that there is no more difficult position to assert in a Canadian university setting than one that strikes students as pro-American. Our students are, by definition, mostly young, and they therefore take very easily to anti-establishment and anti-American positions on social and political issues.

"Thus, Israel advocates on campus are fighting not only a substantial amount of ignorance about Israel and the Palestinians, but also the entrenched Canadian prejudice against arguments about world politics that do not denounce the United States."

Green said much of the opposition to Israel comes from academic circles and the left, adding that "decent academics" should align themselves with Israel and the West.

Jewish academics in particular should "make known the importance of Israel in the post-Holocaust world, and to keep alive the need of the Jews for a state of their own in their ancestral homeland."

Morgan learned this lesson in Israel advocacy while studying at Northwestern University in the 1970s – a lesson that would stay with him.

"I came to the realization then, and I still believe, that it is for the faculty – or at least those knowlegeable in the area – to take the lead in rebutting the anti-Israel trends of the students and the academic community at large.

"It is remarkable the impact that one or two engaged faculty members can have on a given campus."

Professors are important role models, Green added. "The students need to see their professors standing up for Israel and for the Jews, and speaking up for Israel and the Jews. There should be no doubt in the public's mind on which side decent Jewish academics stand."

The Book of Life Is …

…a promise made by one generation to the next. A promise that the values of our Jewish heritage will be preserved and community resources will be available for future generations, d'or l'dor.

On October 14, 2003, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto launched this project with more than 200 guests on hand to witness the first 41 honourees sign their stories for inclusion in this community archive. Endowment fund holders, Lion of Judah Endowment donors and donors who have left a bequest to UJA Federation were among those who committed their stories to the Book of Life project. You can read their stories by going to our website at www.jewishtorontotomorrow.net and clicking on Jewish Foundation, then Book of Life.

The evening was a great success, setting the stage for next year's event to inscribe more donor stories in the Book of Life. If you're interested in finding out more about how you can tell your story, please call Maxine Bessin, Senior Endowment Associate, 416-631-5827 or email at jewishfoundation@ujafed.org.

Barrie congregation holds first service in new building

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With the opening of its new premises, Congregation Am Shalom in Barrie has become the only North American Reform congregation to open a building in 2003.

The first services in the new building, attended by about 230 people, were held on Yom Kippur, when a mezuzah was dedicated in honour of Rabbi Bernard Baskin, the rabbi emeritus of Anshe Sholom Congregation in Hamilton who led Am Shalom's High Holy Day services for 15 years.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, rabbi emeritus of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto, will now be part-time spiritual leader of Am Shalom.

Am Shalom president Stephen Sperling, who has lived in Barrie for 31 years with his wife and three daughters, said there had always been a small Jewish community in Barrie, but 25 years ago they formed the Simcoe County Jewish Association.

"We began with a Hebrew school, then we added High Holy Day services, and we just kept growing. In the last five years we really took off. There is now a core of 85 families, with another 50 or 60 families that come and go.

"People, some who had been travelling to Toronto to attend synagogue, want a community close to home. When couples start having children, they want to feel rooted to where they live," Sperling said in a telephone interview.

The land for the new building was donated by Henry Bernick, a retired Barrie developer, and in a period of 16 months, the congregation was able to raise $1.3 million to build, Sperling said.

"We raised most of the money from personal donors, and Adath Israel [Poale Zedek] Synagogue in Montreal donated four Torahs. This has all been very exciting for us. Kol Nidre night we had five Torahs."

The congregation's Hebrew school, which has about 40 students, will be moving into the new building, and Am Shalom expects to hold a bar mitzvah in the next couple of months, Sperling said.

It has also dedicated land for Barrie's first Jewish cemetery.

"We have a vibrant, warm community. We recently received a call from a lawyer who was interested in moving to Barrie. We were able to direct him to a law firm, and now he sits on the board of the synagogue.

"Until now, we met where we could, but now we finally have roots. It's a heartwarming story.

"I was here when there was very little for me Jewishly. It is important to have our own synagogue. Otherwise, we would just assimilate," he said.

Israeli concert pianist honoured in Ottawa by Hadassah-WIZO

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — More than 150 members and friends of Ottawa Hadassah-WIZO enjoyed a performance earlier this month by one of Israel's cultural exports and a longtime beneficiary of Hadassah-WIZO projects in Israel.

Concert pianist Carmen Or, the guest of honour at WIZO's Youth Aliyah/Youth Services Oct. 14 campaign launch at Agudath Israel Synagogue, shared the story of her escape from the former Soviet Union, her settlement in Israel as a 13-year-old child with neither friend nor family, and the subsequent years during which the people at WIZO became her family and mentors.

Or became 'a WIZO child'

Ottawa Hadassah-WIZO is affiliated with the worldwide Hadassah-WIZO organization that provides educational, healthcare and social services for Israeli citizens and new immigrants of all ages.

Or, now 38 and living in Montreal, grew up surrounded by music. Her mother was an opera singer with the Bolshoi Opera in Moscow. At the age of five, she began to play the piano. By 13, she was chosen to represent Russia internationally at a competition in Geneva, where she was awarded first prize and a gold medal. Amid the media attention, the teen decided to defect.

Although she knew nothing about Judaism – "I only knew about Yom Kippur because my grandmother fasted" – she looked in the telephone directory and found the name of a rabbi whom she called for help.

Her daring escape resulted in her arrival in Israel and separation from her family.

"This is Israel for me – an open home, a family… you give them one hand and they embrace you with both," she said.

She became, as she called it, a "WIZO child."

"If Israel gave me a chance for life, WIZO gave me a chance to make something of that life. I began to represent Israel around the world at piano competitions and was always taken in by a WIZO family," she said. "I am an Israeli and I have a family all over the world… the WIZO family."

Following a performance of Beethoven's Appasionata sonata, Or made an appeal for Israeli children living in poverty.

"There are many orphans in Israel right now who have no one and they are looking for help. You extend your help to them and make miracles," she said.

Scant attention paid to Mahathir's anti-Jewish rant

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

"It is hard to know what is more alarming – a toxic statement of hatred of Jews by the Malaysian prime minister at an Islamic summit meeting this week or the unanimous applause it engendered from kings, presidents and emirs in the audience." So began the New York Times' Oct. 18 editorial.

One may argue that the reaction of the 57 members of the Organization of Islamic Congress (OIC) – a standing ovation for Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad – was even more alarming than his anti-Semitic outburst, in which he said "Jews rule the world by proxy" and "get others to fight and die for them."

But it is indisputable that, along with Mahathir's slander, the reaction of the heads of the world's largest Islamic assembly, representing 1.3 billion people, should have received widespread attention from Canadian media outlets. Oddly, or perhaps predictably – depending on your point of view – it did not.

On the day Mahathir spoke (Oct. 16), CBC's The National devoted a mere half-minute to the story, saying that the prime minister of Malaysia had made "some shocking comments about Jews." Mahathir was shown claiming that "1.3 billion Muslims cannot be defeated by a few million Jews." Anchor Peter Mansbridge added one line: "Mahathir Mohamad called on Muslims to unite to find a non-violent way to achieve what he called a final victory against the enemy." That was it. No mention of the size of the assembly of Islamic leaders or, more importantly, their unanimous, ringing endorsement of Mahathir's poisonous remarks.

On CBC Radio's World Report, Oct. 17, Peter Lloyd reported that leading Muslim delegates to the conference – including the Egyptian foreign minister and the head of the Arab League – "immediately came out and praised what Dr. Mahathir said. It went down very well with that audience."

Unfortunately, Lloyd's attention to this vital piece of information was not conveyed by many other electronic media outlets, and its broader significance was mostly lost.

Even more surprising was the complete inattention to the story by both Global National and CTV News with Lloyd Robertson on Oct. 16 and in the days immediately following. It was almost a week later, on Oct. 21, when both newscasts covered the story, reporting on Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's insipid exchange with the Malaysian Prime Minister at the APEC summit in Bangkok, Thailand. CTV devoted attention to the anger within the Canadian Jewish community over Chrétien's failure to rebuke Mahathir.

Mahathir's comments were not just the ravings of a crank. They represent a widespread conspiratorial mindset about Jews that has a dangerously frightening grip on much of the Islamic world today. The reaction of the Islamic leaders, which confirms this, makes the story so compelling. Yet CBC Radio programs such as As It Happens, The Current and Sunday Edition, which typically delve into important international stories, ignored it.

The print media generally provided more coverage and commentary. In its Oct. 17 editorial, "Mahathir's poison," the Globe and Mail issued a strongly worded rebuke. The Toronto Star waited until Oct. 20 to publish a short editorial on the subject. While the National Post had no editorial comment, on Oct. 21 it ran a major op-ed piece, "Mahathir's pack of lies," by Iranian journalist and author Amir Taheri, that provided in-depth analysis of what transpired in Malaysia and its significance.

The Canadian news media need to pay far more attention both to the dangerous rise in conspiracy-laden anti-Semitism in many parts of the Muslim world, and to those moderate Islamic voices that condemn it.

Muslims condemn Mahathir, MPs slam Chrétien

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Two of three Canadian Muslim organizations contacted by The CJN for their reactions have roundly condemned the recent anti-Semitic tirade by Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad.

Mahathir triggered a firestorm of controversy around the world when he told an Islamic meeting in Malaysia earlier this month that Jews "rule this world by proxy. They get others to fight and die for them." He also hinted at the need for Muslims to rise up and curb Jewish power.

"I have no qualms denouncing" Mahathir's remarks, said Riad Saloojee of the Council on American-Islamic Relations Canada. "They are really quite disgusting and completely at odds with Islam in letter and spirit."

Muslims "have to do a lot of soul-searching to confront" this sort of sentiment, Saloojee said. "Clearly, the community has to get beyond scapegoating other communities," and needs to take a "a very, very hard and critical look at itself."

Mahathir's comments reflect badly on all Muslims, he said.

"We condemn something like that. It's not something we would endorse or Muslims would endorse," said Faisal Kutty, general counsel to the Canadian Muslim Civil Liberties Association.

"By making that kind of statement, [Mahathir] lost the whole impact and balance of his speech," Kutty said. He called the speech "good" overall, in that it included a call to Muslims to re-examine many of their fears and concerns, "but by focusing attention [on Jews], he made sure no one would listen."

Mohamed Elmasry, national president of the Canadian Islamic Congress, called Mahathir's remarks "regrettable," but would not condemn them.

"He shouldn't have said it. There was no need for him to say it. He could have made his point without it."

But Elmasry said the comments "were in the context of praising Jewish achievement after the Holocaust. He said that despite the fact that 6 million of 12 million Jews were killed, they managed to take a non-violent route to reconciliation and healing. I thought this was a very positive assessment."

Elmasry called Mahathir "a very wise man and high achiever" whom he met a year ago. Elmasry said it would "serve [CJN] readers well" to read the entire text of the speech.

"Two lines got headlines. It was a regrettable statement within a good speech. It was unfortunate language, but even in his speech, he tried to correct himself [by saying] some Jews are against Israel's policies."

Calls to the Canadian Arab Federation and the newly created Muslim Canadian Congress were not returned by press time.

In a guest editorial in the Montreal Gazette last week, Yahya Abdul Rahman, an editor with the Montreal Muslim News Network, blasted Mahathir's comments as "anti-Semitic, racist to the core, outrageous and simply untrue.

"As a Muslim who believes all forms of racist intolerance are a grievous sin against God and humanity, I repudiate and distance myself from Mahathir's statements. He does not speak for me, but sadly enough, his words will be used to embolden anti-Semites everywhere and be used as a farther pretext to further malign Islam and Muslims," Rahman said.

"Our leaders should be more careful when they speak, as what they say reflects on the whole Muslim community. Mahathir's remarks make all Muslims look like a pack of anti-Semite [sic] bigots."

Mahathir repeated his allegations a few days later in a newspaper interview.

"In my speech I condemned all violence, even the suicide bombings, and I told all Muslims it's about time we stopped all these things and paused to think and do something that is much more productive," he told the Bangkok Post on Oct. 21.

"That was the whole tone of my speech, but they picked up one sentence where I said that the Jews control the world.

"Well, the reaction of the world shows they do control the world."

He blamed the Western media because "many newspapers are owned by Jews.

"They only see that angle and they have a powerful influence over people," he said. "Only their side of the picture is given now. The Muslims, we are pictured as terrorists, unreasonable people, unable to administer our countries, unable to develop our countries.

"Israel is a small country. There are not many Jews in the world. But they are so arrogant that they defy the whole world. Even if the United Nations say no, they go ahead. Why? Because they have the backing of all these people."

Foreign Minister Bill Graham condemned Mahathir's original comments as unacceptable, and Malaysia's high commissioner in Ottawa was called in to express this country's outrage.

Graham called Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy from Bangkok the day after the remarks were delivered, something Landy said he "appreciated."

"He appeared outraged at the comments and was very receptive to working with us and to find a way to get moderate Muslims to speak out and denounce [the remarks]," Landy told The CJN.

As for Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, who shook hands with Mahathir a few days later at the summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation in Bangkok, "he's made himself irrelevant," Landy said. "It's one more embarrassment for him and the country."

Landy likened the prime minister's gesture to his handshake a year ago with Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah at the francophonie summit in Beirut.

"I talked with him," Chrétien said when asked about his exchange with Mahathir. "I said his speech was not well received in Canada. But he gave an explanation that he invited everybody to read the whole speech, you know."

Asked whether he offered Mahathir his own opinion of the remarks, Chrétien added: "I said [the day before that] it was unacceptable… We were a bunch of guys there, you know."

The day after the handshake, deputy prime minister John Manley said the government's position was "very clear. [The remarks are] not acceptable. We don't tolerate them, we don't countenance them at all and I don't think that there has ever been any ambiguity about our government's views."

Mahathir's remarks and Chrétien's reaction triggered three days of sharp comment by opposition MPs and Senators, just as MPs passed an historic bill proclaiming an annual Holocaust Memorial Day.

Comments in the House of Commons included the following:

Carolyn Bennett (St. Paul's, Lib.): "I wish to add my voice to that of the Canadian government in condemning Mr. Mahathir's remarks in the strongest possible way."

Anita Neville (Winnipeg South Centre, Lib.): "Comments in [Mahathir's] speech were blatantly anti-Semitic, highly inflammatory and unequivocally false… That his remarks were applauded by the Muslim leadership in attendance at the conference speaks to the ever-present fears of the Jewish people. His language was shocking and only furthers racist hatred, and his subsequent unwillingness to acknowledge his remarks as such is even more appalling.

Val Meredith (South Surrey–White Rock–Langley, Canadian Alliance): "The prime minister has once again failed to voice Canadian values and looked weak and unconcerned. Why did the other world leaders recognize the need to criticize Mahathir's comments? Canada's prime minister should represent Canadian values and have condemned the Malaysian prime minister's statements."

Pat Martin (Winnipeg Centre, NDP): "On this day when Parliament has agreed to establish Yom Hashoah as Holocaust Memorial Day I call upon our prime minister to publicly denounce Mahathir Mohamad and to state clearly that we consider his shameful racist comments a hate crime on an international level."

Deborah Grey (Edmonton North, Canadian Alliance): "Mr. Speaker, well, our so-called prime minister has once again failed Canada miserably on the international stage. Or, our prime minister reported that he had told Mr. Mahathir only that his speech was not 'well received' in Canada, but then went on to say that the Malaysian prime minister gave an explanation and invited everybody to read the whole speech, as if that would help. Is our prime minister suggesting that this is simply a matter of words taken out of context?

"After two days of pressure, all our prime minister could muster up was 'I regret today to have to use such strong words against you.' They were not strong enough. Shame."

Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley, Canadian Alliance): "What do we do when the current prime minister, the one who is not here right now but is overseas somewhere, is over in Malaysia embarrassing the country by shaking hands with people who are accusing the Jews of ruling the world?"

גידי קורן וחברים

ישראל, סתיו 2003

ישראל בסתיו 2003 היא מקום שונה. על פניו, יוצאים, מבלים, נוסעים לחו"ל, אך הרבה פחות ביטחון כלכלי והרבה יותר ספקות האם יש פתרון נגד האיסלם הטרוריסטי שאין לו שום כבוד ומחיר לחיי אדם. כן, חייבים להמשיך ולהאבק, אך הרבה יותר אנשים, גם בסקרים רשמיים וגם בשיחות אישיות אינם מאמינים שיש שם עתיד לילדיהם.

מי שמיכם קורא עיתונים עבריים יודע שסיקור מלחמת יום כיפור מכל זוית אפשרית- הוא עכשיו אייטם מרכזי גם ברדיו ובטלביזיה. אם כי באופן כללי זה יצא לכולם מן האף- די, כמה אפשר, ומה זה עוזר.

חשבתי לשתף אתכם בכמה דברים טובים שראיתי, שהרי רבים מיכם מבקרים בארץ לעתים תכופות.

איסמעיליה

הילל מיטלפונקט הוא אחד המחזאים הפוריים ביותר בשלוש העשורים האחרונים. לדעת רבים-זהו אחד המחזות הכי מושלמים שלו. עצוב, מצחיק, נוגע ללב. שלושה חברים מן המוצב באיסמעיליה במלחמת ההתשה נפגשים שלושים שנה מאוחר יותר. למעשה היו קשרים ביניהם כל השנים, ושניים מהם (מיקי ועמי) אפילו חברים קרובים. השלישי, קריץ- הכבשה השחורה, שדבר לא הצליח בידו מאז הצבא-חי את תקופת התעלה כאילו קרתה אתמול. אלא שיש לו לקריץ יתרון חשוב- הוא הציל את חייו של מיקי, שהוא עכשיו גניקולוג ידוע ועשיר שעוסק בהפרייה חוץ גופית. הנושא העיקרי של ההצגה הוא הבגידה, בעיקר הבגידה בחברות. מחזה חובה. משחק מעולה של ששון גבאי, נתן דטנר ואבי אוריה. תיאטרון בית לסין. כשאתם מגיעים ארצה- ישר תחפשו בעיתון ותזמינו כרטיסים ל"איסמעיליה", או יותר טוב- שיזמינו לכם.

הכוכבים של שלומי

סרט נוגע ללב ואופטימי על חייו של ילד שנחשב על ידי כולם לילד גבולי, מאוד נחמד, הדֶבֶק של המשפחה, אך נכשל בלימודים. עד שיום אחד המורה למתימטיקה שם לב שלמרות ששלומי איננו יודע את הדרך שבה הוא מגיע לתשובות- כל התשובות שלו נכונות.

ואז יש קטע בחדר המנהל שבו שלומי בן השש עשרה בטוח שהולכים לזרוק אותו מבית הספר, אך המנהל, קצין לשעבר בצבא, שואל אותו שאלות חשבון מסובכות ומוצא שהוא בעצם גאון, שהמערכת כמעט החמיצה בגלל טפשותה ובינוניותה. את הקטע הזה בסרט סיימתי זולג דמעות, גם בגלל הרגישות הנפלאה של מנהל, שבסטריוטיפ ציפית שיהיה אטום וטיפש, וגם בגלל הצדק שיוצא לאור. סוף טוב-הילד הולך לבית ספר למחוננים. והכוכבים של שלומי- על שום מה?- על שם עוגות ועוגיות הכוכבים הנפלאות שהוא אופה.

ושוב, אם תבקרו בארץ- תרוצו לראות, אם כי יש לי הרגשה שהסרט יגיע הֵנָה, ואולי גם יצליח כאן, כי הנושא כל כך אוניברסאלי.

בשורות טובות

כדרכי, אני מחפש בשורות טובות בתוך כל הצרות שקורות בארץ.

אז ככה: למרות שבכדורגל ממשיכה ישראל להפסיד כמעט בכל פורום- יש לנו אלוף עולם חדש בהיאבקות, ואלופת עולם חדשה בשיט אולימפי. ובמישור הכלכלי, אחרי הסרת ההתנגדות מצד ארה"ב, חתמה ישראל על חוזה ליצור מטוסי ביון עבור הודו בסך 1.2 מיליארד דולאר אמריקניים, העסקה הגדולה ביותר בתולדות המדינה! אבל שישאר בינינו.

T-SHIRT ART: Grade 5 students at Leo Baeck Day School created their own illustrated T-shirts based on their study of the novel Holes by Louis Sachar. With the help of their teachers and volunteer parents, they used fabric crayons to draw their favourite scene from the novel onto paper to be ironed onto a T-shirt that each of them will wear during Canadian Children's Book Week, Nov. 1 to 8. Seen, from left, are Daphne Stivelman, Katie Tepperman and Samantha Bogoroch.

But the CIC "is still frustrated by Canada's tendency to equivocate on Israel's right to self defence," Goldberg added. "Canada affirms Israel's right to protect itself but then qualifies its position."

The Oct. 21 vote before the UN's General Assembly called on Israel to stop and reverse construction of its security wall, which Palestinians have charged encroaches on their territory, splits Jerusalem and divides families. So far, 145 kilomotres of the 640-km fence has been built.

Four countries – the United States, Israel, the Marshall Islands and Micronesia – voted against the measure. Twelve nations abstained.

Canada often abstains on UN resolutions that criticize Israel, but its vote this time is not seen as a departure from its Mideast policy, Goldberg said.

The resolution is nearly identical to an Arab-sponsored measure the United States vetoed a week earlier at the UN Security Council because it did not contain condemnation of terrorist acts.

Canada and other nations, particularly those of the 15-member European Union, reworked the new resolution to include the condemnation of "the recent suicide bombings and intensification of violence with the attack in Haifa and the bomb attack in the Gaza strip, which killed three American security officers."

It also calls on both parties to fulfill their obligations under the "road map" peace plan; urges the Palestinian Authority "to undertake visible efforts to restrain individuals and groups conducting and planning violent attacks;" and calls on Israel "to take no actions undermining trust, including deportations and attacks on civilians and extrajudicial killings."

The amended resolution was then introduced by Italy on behalf of the EU, which is one of the sponsors of the road map, along with the United States, Russia and the UN.

In return for EU support, the Palestinians and their supporters agreed to drop a second resolution that would have asked the International Court of Justice at The Hague, Netherlands, for an opinion on the legality of the barrier.

But the resolution raises the possibility of going to the court sometime in the future if Israel doesn't comply with the demand to dismantle the fence.

It also asks UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to submit periodic reports on Israel's compliance, with the first due within one month. Once the report is received, the resolution says, "further actions should be considered, if necessary, within the United Nations system."

The resolution, which is not legally binding on Israel, expresses the UN's "particular concern that the route marked out for the wall under construction by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territory, including in and around East Jerusalem, could prejudice future negotiations and make the two-state solution physically impossible to implement and would cause further humanitarian hardship to the Palestinians."

A spokesperson for Israel at the UN called the vote a "humiliating farce" and decried the "disservice" being done to the UN "as long as the majority pandered to the resolution." Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel will continue building the barrier.

While commending Canada for securing the inclusion of the condemnation of terror attacks, Goldberg said Canada's explanation of its vote "contains a sense of unreality."

Saying Canada respects Israel's right and obligation to defend itself, Canada's UN ambassador, Paul Heinbecker, explained the country's vote in a statement by repeating its oft-cited policy that it "opposes all unilateral actions which could predetermine the outcome of final status negotiations," including the construction of "an extensive security barrier on land inside the occupied territory of the West Bank.

"Canada considers the expropriation of land to facilitate the construction of this barrier to be unacceptable."

Canada, the statement said, is concerned "with the highly prejudicial impact this barrier may have on the already-flagging prospects for peace. Further, its adverse effect on the ever-dire humanitarian and economic situation in the Occupied Territories is worrisome. We fear that the scope and location of the barrier being constructed further undermines the hopes of the many who yet yearn for peace."

Goldberg said Canada's explanation is "surreal" because it implies there is a peace process to defend.

"Israel was compelled to build the barrier in response to terrorism. The peace process was destroyed by Palestinians' use of terror.

"Israel has a right to expect a little more from its friends, including Canada."

In a statement, CIC chief executive officer Shimon Fogel said his organization is "increasingly frustrated that while Canada endorses Israel's right to protect its citizens from the constant onslaught of Palestinian terrorism in theory, Canada keeps on issuing objections to its practical application.

"Canada has to stop confusing the arsonist with the firefighter; it is the unwillingness of the Palestinian Authority to dismantle terror groups and the murderous acts committed by these groups that is crippling the peace process, not the Israeli measures designed to stop them."

On the same day the resolution was passed, a senior UN official told the Security Council that Israel has quickened the pace of erecting the fence.

"Over the last month the speed of construction has accelerated," Kieran Prendergast, UN under-secretary general for political affairs, said in his monthly briefing on the Middle East. "Palestinians along the barrier's route face land loss and severely restricted access to jobs, markets and essential social services… We repeat our call to the Israeli authorities to halt construction of the wall."

Canadian MPs find Muslim anger at Israel, U.S.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian parliamentarians meeting the elite of Arab intellectual and political society in Jordan and the Palestinian territories were confronted last week with a virtually monolithic expression of anger at Israel's "occupation" and intense feelings of anti-Americanism, according to Montreal MP Irwin Cotler.

In meetings with "top people" during a 10-day Mideast tour, Cotler said he was taken aback at the intensity of the emotions and views expressed by his Arab interlocutors. Cotler, who first visited the Arab Middle East in 1975 and who has been to Jordan nine time and Egypt 13 times, said he never before experienced "the intensification of the focus on the Israel and Palestinian conflict in general and the occupation in particular. It came up wherever we went."

In meetings with politicians, intellectuals, journalists and NGO representatives, the parliamentarians heard that "the occupation was the root of all evil. We heard that in every strand of the Jordanian meetings."

Speakers brought up Israeli military checkpoints "as a kind of metaphor. For the Palestinians, it's held out as a sense of humiliation and restrictions on their movements" while "they refer to suicide bombings as acts of resistance," he said.

Cotler, along with MPs Keith Martin (Canadian Alliance) and Bernard Patry (Liberal), were in the Middle East to research the world of Islam.

Three groups of MPs from Parliament's foreign affairs committee have recently visited different parts of the Muslim world. One group visited southeast Asia, including India and Malaysia, while another visited Iran, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. Cotler's group visited Jordan, the Palestinian territories, Israel and Egypt.

The foreign affairs committee is planning to compile its findings in a report to Parliament. The report, which will likely be published early in the new year, "will reflect what we heard and where, in a modest way, Canada can play a role," Cotler said.

Although the report has yet to be written, Cotler said, "The idea was that we have to have an approach that will not be adversarial as the West versus Islam. Our discourse is not that of a conflict of civilizations… it is one of a dialogue and what we can do to promote understanding."

The foreign affairs committee has already held hearings on the issue and will hear from other presenters before the report is begun, Cotler added.

Speaking from the Middle East before the Cairo leg of the trip, Cotler said what was "compelling was the intensity of the focus on the conflict and the occupation as the root of all evil."

In addition, the United States, which is seen as supporting Israel's occupation and is now seen as an occupier itself in Iraq, came in for heated criticism, even "hatred," he said.

"Israel is seen almost as an extension of America, not as a legitimate independent entity, but as its agent in the Middle East, which is a delegitmating feature."

In Jordan, one of the group's contacts told him that "98 per cent of Jordanians hate Americans. We felt an intense animus against the United States. It was palpable."

The U.S. invasion of Iraq was seen as a prelude to further incursions in Mideastern states and the group heard the argument, presented by secular Jordanians and Palestinians, that the Israeli occupation has inflamed the Arab and Muslim world and "made the Arab world more Islamic."

Cotler said he often presented a counterargument in an attempt to balance the discussion, but "when you hear a case presented in a very powerful way and given the emotionalism that underpinned it, it's hard for people who don't know the whole situation not be affected by it."

The "sheer weight of exposure would get someone to have sympathy certainly for Palestinian suffering."

While the group heard a unified and emotional voice from the Arab side, their Israeli contacts spoke in a calmer manner in an office setting, which did not lend itself to the same kind of impact achieved in a visit to Palestinian areas. What's more, there was disagreement among Israelis – as might be expected in a democracy – on a number of issues, including the Geneva agreement promoted by Meretz MK Yossi Beilin. Incredibly, Cotler said, even one Shinui member of the governing coalition supported the initiative while two other government members opposed it.

On another occasion, an Israeli journalist seemed to confirm the Palestinian characterization of Israel's security fence, also calling it an "apartheid" fence, Cotler said.

Meanwhile, on the Palestinian side, specific suggestions were advanced for Canadian policymakers to adopt while no such unified message was advanced by Israeli parliamentarians.

Arab contacts refused to condemn the speech by Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, saying the entire speech should be examined and the comments on Jews were only a small part of the overall message, Cotler said.

Yom Hashoah proclaimed national memorial day

By ZEV KALIN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Less than a week after Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad received a standing ovation from the leaders of 57 Muslim states for saying "Jews rule this world by proxy," the House of Commons passed a private-member's bill sponsored by MPs from all five parties to create a nationwide Holocaust memorial day.

At a press conference following the bill's passing, Auschwitz survivor Nate Leipciger, who was representing survivors on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), compared the climate in Germany just before the Holocaust to today's rising anti-Semitism.

"Those remarks [by Mahathir] are very reminiscent of 1938 when Hitler was talking about the fact that the Jews are a scourge to the world and they must be eliminated," Leipciger said.

The bill, which proclaims an annual Holocaust Memorial Day on the Hebrew calendar date of Yom Hashoah, was introduced by five MPs and passed last Tuesday, Oct. 21 with the unanimous consent of the Commons. It must still be approved by the Senate.

The five sponsors of the bill were Bloc Québécois MP Richard Marceau, Tory MP Scott Brison, Liberal MP Art Eggleton, Canadian Alliance MP Scott Reid and NDP MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis.

"One of the most important things about this bill is that each and every parliamentarian, the elected officials of Canada, regardless of their party affiliation, passed this bill unanimously," Marceau said. "That is how strongly this country feels the Holocaust should be remembered."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, said, "The fact that all five parties unanimously supported this bill speaks volumes about Canada's response to racists like Mahathir Mohamad. It would have been nice for our prime minister to have been with us as well. Perhaps it's symbolic in many ways that he's not here today. Instead he chose to shake the hand of the Malaysian prime minister without condemning his inflammatory remarks."

Leipciger agreed, saying, "[Chrétien's] absence of condemnation of the remarks [by Mahathir] sent a very damaging message to Canadians and to the world."

Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president of CJC, said, "Canada has been a world leader in officially recognizing the significance of the Holocaust. Beginning in 1998 with Ontario, all 10 provinces have enacted Holocaust remembrance legislation. It's very gratifying to see the federal Parliament take a similar step."

Marceau is credited by his co-sponsors with being the bill's champion.

"He's done a lot and deserves the credit for getting the act to where it is today," said Wasylycia-Leis, who recalled how she had tabled the bill in 1998.

"When the House dissolved in October of 2000, the bill died. I tried to reintroduce it as a private member's bill," she said, "but very few bills are allowed to be introduced that way. I never won the lottery. I had been looking for another way to get it introduced when Richard came to me and suggested an all-party approach. I was delighted."

Reid said, "[Marceau] had to find a sponsor in each party. Then he had to clear the bill with every party caucus, arrange to have first, second, and third reading done all in one shot and get the House Leaders and the Speaker of the House on side. It was a lot of work."

Rochelle Wilner, president of B'nai Brith Canada, said, "We welcome the efforts of Richard Marceau in garnering the support of all the parties to enact this legislation declaring an annual Holocaust remembrance day. It's important that our government show its commitment to combating racism and genocide in all its forms. By acknowledging and remembering the horrors of the Holocaust, they are insuring that future generations of Canadians will bear witness and never forget. "

Security fence will 'ghettoize' Jews again, says academic

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The irony of the massive security fence being built to keep terrorists out of Israel is that it will "ghettoize" Jews again, a result entirely out of keeping with Zionism's ideals, says a well-known Jewish Canadian academic.

"From 1947 to 1967, Israel was fenced in," Janice Stein, professor of conflict management and negotiation at the University of Toronto, said to a full hall at the Gelber Conference Centre earlier this month.

"Zionism was supposed to be about the normalization off the Jewish condition, the end of the ghetto, the end of the fencing off of the Jewish people. Does the Zionist dream translate into the creation of the largest Jewish ghetto ever?"

The fence, she said, will only serve to "ghettoize" both Israelis and Palestinians and harden positions.

It will also isolate Israeli communities in the West Bank and virtually surround some Palestinian enclaves, almost closing them off completely.

Stein said Israelis support the fence because it seems to be a "simple solution" to terror. But she said senior army commanders are not all that optimistic about how effective it will be in keeping out terrorists.

"It will reduce terror, but certainly not eliminate it," she said.

To even approach doing that, Israel's military would have to use forces to patrol the fence in much greater numbers than it has up to now, she said.

The trouble with such static defences, Stein said, is that they not as effective as moving defences, which is why Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon resisted building it.

Even if it were impenetrable, the fence still leaves Israel vulnerable from the sea, she said.

The ghetto issue aside, Stein said she would be less opposed to it if it followed the the 1967 borders known as the Green Line. Instead, parts of it go deep into Palestinian territory, creating de facto borders and cutting off some Palestinians from their own areas, she said.

JWI needs more young women, new president says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Freda Gottesman-Brender, incoming president of Jewish Women International of Canada (JWI/C), says the organization has taken a giant leap into the future.

"We're looking at JWI through a new set of eyes based on the reality of the day," she says.

A JWI member for 36 years, Gottesman-Brender, a retired mathematics teacher originally from Montreal, founded the Calgary chapter when she lived there with her husband and daughters in the early 1980s. In Toronto, she has served on the national board of JWI/C.

"The core values of JWI are to create social change, but we realize that there is a more meaningful way to encapsulate the values of our organization."

Freda Gottesman-Brender

Women have been working for years to make a place for themselves in the work world, she says, "but it has come at a price for Jewish women's organizations. We have come to recognize that all of the organizations are faltering in membership.

"We believe that women still want to make a difference but within the confines of their time. There are many intelligent young women who are committed to Judaism, but are very time-crunched.

"[Our challenge] is to position the work of the organization in order to attract these women," says Gottesman-Brender.

After consulting with Ruth Flicker, a specialist in strategic planning who has done extensive work with U.S. women's groups, she says, "we learned that every non-profit organization in North America is facing a crisis. There are fewer members, with less time and fewer dollars to donate. Ruth is opening our eyes as to what is happening [across the continent], and the impact it has had.

"We are working with her in order to find new and innovative ways to engage women in the important work that we do. Without young Jewish women, there is no future for Jewish organizational life."

It's clear that younger women can't make the same commitment to organizations as their mothers and grandmothers did, Gottesman-Brender says.

"The world is a different place now. [If people do join an organization] they are afraid to take on a task because there are not enough people to help out. They do not want to take sole responsibility."

With shrinking numbers, "members also need to accept the responsibility of raising more money," she says.

Gottesman-Brender will be installed along with the rest of the new executive board at this weekend's JWI/C convention, titled "A Force for Social Change."

Speakers include Laurel Rothman, the executive director, of Campaign 2000, the drive to end child poverty; Wendy Cukier, president of the Coalition for Gun Control; and Hedda Matza-Haughton, who will lead participants in a journey through laughter, fun and play. Also on the agenda are several interactive workshops, including one led by Ruth Flicker.

At Sunday's closing luncheon, the organization is honouring Sharon Hampson, entertainer and breast cancer activist, with the JWI/C Woman of Achievement Award.

Israeli firefighters launch Friends group

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Israel's firefighters are looking for friends.

It's often forgotten that the firefighters are the first on the scene of a terrorist attack, whether or not there is a fire, and they treat casualties until ambulances arrive, said Israel's national fire and rescue services commissioner Shimon Romach.

Romach is on a North American tour with a twofold mission: to exchange information with fire officials here on areas of common interest, and to officially launch the American and Canadian Friends of Israeli Firefighters, organizations that will raise funds to update the country's aging firetrucks and other equipment.

Romach said the country needs at least 100 new vehicles, which cost $300,000 to $1 million US each. Israel is also interested in buying used vehicles from abroad.

Romach, who was a senior officer in the Israeli Security Agency (Shin Bet) for 23 years working mainly in anti-terrorism intelligence, was last year named fire commissioner, a position within the interior ministry.

"In 2002, we responded to 40 suicide bombings, as well as other types of attacks, such as shootings. Unfortunately, we are gaining experience in dealing with terrorism, which fire departments in North America, especially since 9/11, are interested in. We also have expertise to share in preparing for biological and chemical attacks," he said.

Romach, who was accompanied by the Friends' director-general Eldad Halachmi, began his tour at a fire chiefs' conference in Washington, D.C., and then went to New York, where he met Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta.

In Montreal, he met at the fire department's Park Avenue headquarters with deputy director André Brunelle and Charles St. Onge, deputy director of strategic planning.

Romach was interested in learning how Montreal has managed to harmonize the 20-odd fire departments on the island since the municipal merger Jan. 1, 2002.

Israel's fire services are organized into 26 zones, rather than at the municipal level, Romach said. He would like to see that pared down to six or seven zones.

Romach also met with Montreal executive committee members Peter Yeomans, who is responsible for public security, and Robert Libman, who is in charge of urban planning.

While in Canada, Romach said he would like to learn something about fighting forest fires.

Another goal of his trip is to foster brotherhood between Jewish firefighters here and in Israel, and possibly organize exchange visits to each other's cities.

Romach met with two of the three Jewish members of Montreal's fire service: Richard Liebmann, director of public affairs, and Victor Fleischer, president of the Pompiers Auxiliaires de Montreal, the volunteer firefighters' association. (Missing was Doug Lion, who works in the prevention division.)

From Montreal, Romach was scheduled to visit Ottawa, Toronto, Houston and Los Angeles before returning home.

Halachmi said he began the process of registering the Canadian Friends of Israeli Firefighters as a charitable organization while in Montreal. The chair of the Friends, which was established in Israel in April, is David Magen, who was a cabinet minister in the Yitzhak Shamir government.

The Friends have been working through United Israel Appeal (which covers all countries outside the United States), and have raised $1.2 million US. The Toronto Jewish community contributed $220,000 of that, Halachmi said.

School's new cookbook offers creative recipes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More than 150 parents of the students at Netivot HaTorah Day School, a centrist Zionist Orthodox school, have worked together for more than two years to produce a colourful and easy-to-read cookbook that will delight both novice and experienced cooks, and raise funds for the school.

Gatherings: Creative Kosher Cooking From Our Families to Yours reflects the dedication of the Netivot parents who received 930 recipes, tested each one three times and then selected and combined some of the recipes to publish 300 in the cookbook. The categories include some longtime favourites and a host of new creative combinations that are gourmet yet easy to prepare.

The Gatherings project was headed by parents Shawna Magence and Carol Lesser. Lesser is a psycho-educational consultant with JVS and Magence manages a law office and serves as president of Emunah Women.

"We felt that it was important to make the book user-friendly," Magence says. "We chose a large font, made sure it was well spaced, added numerous tips on the sides of the recipes, and the book has a special Ottabind binding, which allows you to open the cookbook flat on a surface."

Lesser said "the project was created so everyone in the school could work together, to bring awareness to the community about Netivot HaTorah and we could raise much needed money for the school.

"We tried to make the project fun," she added. "We had many events including contests for some additional recipes."

The publication costs were covered by sponsorships, "so everything is now profit," Magence says. "The first day we received the cookbooks at the school, we sold 500."

The 300-page cookbook has recipes that include Risotto Primavera, Squash and Fennel (Anise) Soup, Terra Chip Chicken, Balsamic Rib-Eye Roast with Roasted Vegetables, Pavlova and numerous desserts and cakes, and a Passover section with clearly marked modifications of recipes that can be used or altered for Passover.

Gatherings: Creative Kosher Cooking, which will make a wonderful gift for a holiday or simchah, will be launched at the Jewish Book Fair on Sunday, Nov. 9, between 7 and 10 p.m. There will be an interactive program that includes samples of culinary delights, floral demonstrations, food styling and table décor ideas.

The cost is $34.99 plus GST. Copies are available by calling Netivot HaTorah, 905-771-1234, ext. 303.

SQUASH AND FENNEL (ANISE) SOUP

1 fennel (anise) bulb
1 tbsp. margarine
1 celery stalk, chopped
1 onion, chopped
1 butternut squash, peeled, seeded and cubed broth: 2 cups water with 1 tbsp. vegetable or pareve chicken soup mix
2 cups water
½ tsp. salt (optional)

Take greenery off fennel bulb. Reserve greenery for garnishing. Chop fennel bulb into thick pieces. Reserve.

Melt margarine in an 8-quart pot over medium heat. Add celery and onion stirring regularly until vegetables are translucent but not golden. Stir in fennel, squash, broth and additional water. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat. Cover and simmer until vegetables are tender, approximately 15-30 minutes. Add salt to taste. Allow soup to cool before puréeing with a hand blender or in a food processor. Reheat prior to serving. Serves 6-8.

Tips: Freezes well. Other types of squash may be substituted instead of butternut.

RISOTTO PRIMAVERA

4 cups chicken or vegetable stock
1 tbsp. margarine
1 onion, chopped
1 carrot, peeled and chopped
2 cloves of garlic, minced
¼ tsp. pepper
2 cups arborio rice, uncooked
½ cup white wine or vegetable stock
1 red pepper, chopped
1 yellow pepper, chopped
2 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped (optional)

In small pot, bring chicken stock to a boil. Reduce heat to low. Set aside.

In a large pot, sauté onion, carrot, garlic and pepper in margarine until vegetables are softened. Stir in arborio rice until well coated. While stirring the rice mixture, add ½ cup of warm stock, stirring constantly until all liquid is absorbed. Add wine, stirring until all the wine is absorbed. Add red and yellow peppers. Continue adding ½ cup stock at a time, stirring after each addition until completely absorbed. Rice should be tender and creamy once all the liquid has been added, approximately 20 minutes. Be sure to keep heat on low to avoid the rice sticking. Stir in parsley if desired. Serves 6-8.

TERRA CHIP CHICKEN

½ cup all purpose flour
1 tbsp. garlic powder
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
6 boneless chicken breasts
1 egg
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. lemon and herb spice
1 170-g bag Terra chips, crushed
⅓ cup margarine

Preheat oven to 350. In a small bowl, combine flour, garlic powder, salt and pepper. Dredge chicken breasts in mixture. Set aside.

In another small bowl, beat egg, mustard, lemon juice and lemon and herb spice together. Set aside. Place crushed chips in a large bowl. Dip chicken first in egg mixture then in crushed Terra chips. Place chicken breasts in roasting pan. In a small saucepan, melt margarine. Drizzle on top of chicken. Place roasting pan, uncovered, in oven. Bake for 30-45 minutes. Serves 6.

BALSAMIC RIB-EYE ROAST WITH ROASTED VEGETABLES

Marinade
2½ cups balsamic vinegar
1¼ cups dry red wine
2 tbsp. brown sugar, packed salt and fresh ground pepper to taste

3-lb. rib-eye roast, tied
⅓ cup olive oil
1½ tsp. coarse salt
fresh ground pepper to taste
2 lbs. baby potatoes
1 lb. pearl onions, peeled
4 carrots, peeled, sliced into rounds

In a large saucepan, combine balsamic vinegar, wine, brown sugar, salt and pepper. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat. Cover and simmer for approximately 15 minutes. Remove from heat. Set aside to cool.

Place roast in a roasting pan. Pour marinade over roast. Cover. Marinate for 1 hour at room temperature or refrigerate for up to 24 hours.

Preheat oven to 325. In a small bowl, combine olive oil, salt and pepper. Set aside. In large bowl, mix potatoes, onions and carrots with olive oil mixture and toss to coat. Place vegetables on a large greased baking sheet. Put in oven on lowest rack. Bake for 30 minutes, tossing occasionally. Meanwhile, uncover the roast. Put on middle rack of oven. Bake uncovered, for 1¼ hours. Remove. Let roast stand 10 minutes before slicing. Servings: 8.

Tips: Roast freezes well. Once cooled, cut roast against the grain then wrap well for freezing.

"I prayed for a miracle and lost 71 pounds"

My name is Marjorie Garst. I lost 71 pounds in eight short months without dieting. I went from a size 20 to a size 10!

I had read the hypnosis ads. Frankly, I was skeptical. It seemed too good to be true. Now it's happened to me.

I dreaded my yearly visits to the doctor. My weight was climbing by ten or more pounds a year. My blood pressure and cholesterol were sky high. I could barely lift myself out of a chair. Yet I couldn't stop eating. I was a career snacker.

Diets made me crave and binge. The only way I lost weight was by starving myself.

Immediate Results ... Doctor's Delight!
My hunger pangs disappeared after my first session. I found myself craving healthy foods. For the first time in my life my blood work and cholesterol are normal!

My entire family has changed thanks to hypnosis. My son lost 30 pounds. My 83-year-old mother lost 18 pounds.

I know how much it hurts to be overweight, but you don't have to suffer any more. Hypnosis worked for me, and it can work for you. CALL NOW!

Anger follows Netzarim attack

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — As a thunderclap explosion signalled the destruction by Israeli forces of three high-rise buildings in Gaza believed to have been used in last Friday's deadly Palestinian raid on the Jewish settlement of Netzarim, the debate in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Cabinet about Netzarim's future grew increasingly heated.

Some members of the Cabinet questioned the wisdom of maintaining the small Jewish town in Gaza, using terms that were more reminiscent of a dovish government than a hawkish one.

"We must not reward violence, but the time has come for the government to hold a discussion on the future of Netzarim," Justice Minister Yosef "Tommy" Lapid said at Sunday's meeting.

His colleague from the secular Shinui Party, Interior Minister Avraham Poraz, proposed that the 60 Israeli families living in Netzarim, who are protected by an entire battalion of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), be evacuated so Netzarim could be turned into a full-time military base.

The two ministers were quickly shot down by other Cabinet members.

"Netzarim should be maintained and bolstered," said Infrastructure Minister Effi Eitam, head of the National Religious Party. "And when there is someone to talk to" on the Palestinian side, he said, "it will be a community next to which the border will run."

Sharon and Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon are also known to oppose any discussion of Netzarim's future.

Fresh from a new round of international criticism for killing Palestinian civilians in recent bombing raids, Israel appeared to take pains not to harm any this time.

In Gaza, Israeli soldiers rounded up Palestinian residents and moved them out of harm's way before demolishing the buildings. The army laid down cover fire to discourage snipers from shooting at soldiers as military engineers fanned out throughout the buildings, planting sticks of dynamite for the building's demolition.

Fuelling Sunday's debate were intensified domestic criticism and feelings of frustration and anger as Israel buried two women who died in the Netzarim attack.

Three soldiers, two of whom were women, were killed by Palestinian gunmen last Friday as they slept in the army base: Sgt. Adi Osman, 19, of Kfar Saba; Sgt. Sarit Shneor, 19, of Shoham; and Staff Sgt. Alon Avrahami, 20, of Or Yehuda. Two other soldiers were wounded by the attacker before he was shot dead by troops. Both Hamas and Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack.

Israel's military, which bars women from most combat roles, is unused to female conscripts dying in battle.

Charges that the women were without their rifles due to budget cuts stoked further controversy.

"How can you put soldiers on the front line without weapons?" the tearful father of Shneor told Israeli television on Sunday, the day his daughter was buried.

A spokesperson for the IDF said the army is investigating the claim that a base commander took away weapons from all female soldiers serving at the base.

There was also anger after it became apparent that the gunman infiltrated Netzarim with little difficulty, using early morning fog to escape surveillance.

Nahum Barnea, a leading Israeli columnist, said the raid highlighted the human cost of budget cuts, given that there were no rifles for the women to use.

"There is denial at work here. There is cowardice. There is an insufferable situation that is beginning to prove insufferable for large sections of Israeli society," Barnea wrote in the daily Yediot Achronot. "Netzarim is a luxury that Israel, in its current situation, cannot really allow itself."

In Mexico, Jews hail new law against anti-Semitic discrimination

By CORRIE MACLAGGAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MEXICO CITY — Mexican Jews are pleased that the government has begun implementing a recent law that explicitly prohibits anti-Semitic discrimination.

The Federal Law to Prevent and Eliminate Discrimination, which one government official called "one of the most advanced laws of its kind," passed unanimously in both legislative chambers in April and was signed by President Vicente Fox in June.

The law calls for a 300-member National Council to Prevent Discrimination, which is being formed and will begin operating in January 2004. The council, which will have branches throughout the country, will address alleged violations of the law.

Anti-Semitism is not a serious problem in Mexico, Jewish leaders said. Still, the law is seen as key to Mexico's future as a democracy.

"This law places Mexico on a level plane with democratic nations," said historian Shulamit Goldsmit, co-ordinator of the Judaic studies program at the Iberoamerican University in Mexico City.

The law prohibits discrimination on the basis of ethnicity, gender, age, disability, economic or social condition, health, pregnancy, language, religion, opinions, sexual preference or marital status. It clearly states that xenophobia and anti-Semitism are forms of discrimination, and calls for equal access to education, jobs and political office.

Previous presidents had issued declarations forbidding discrimination, but they never made them into law.

Former legislator Gilberto Rincon Gallardo, who will direct the anti-discrimination council, said the council's goal is cultural reform – something that could take two or three decades.

Rincon Gallardo of the Social Democratic Party ran for president in 2000 on an anti-discrimination platform. After losing to Fox, Rincon Gallardo founded a citizen's commission against discrimination, which spent two years drafting the law.

"This law is extremely advanced. I believe it's one of the most advanced laws of its kind in the world," Rincon Gallardo said in an interview.

Prohibiting anti-Semitism is an indispensable part of the law, he said.

"In Mexico, there is a certain tradition of looking at Jews as a form of foreigner," he said. "We want the elimination of anti-Semitism to be part of this cultural change."

There are about 50,000 Jews in Mexico, mostly in Mexico City, the capital.

While they don't suffer serious anti-Semitism, the law is an important symbolic measure that could prevent future problems, said Mauricio Lulka, executive director of the Central Jewish Committee, Mexico City's Jewish umbrella organization.

"There was confusion about why anti-Semitism needed to be included," said Lulka, who was part of the citizen's commission that drafted the law. "We explained that anti-Semitism goes beyond ethnic discrimination."

Lulka and Rincon Gallardo both said the law aims less for punishment than for education, which Lulka sees as essential to Mexico's future.

"In the past, Mexican nationalism was defined by sameness," Lulka told JTA in an interview at the committee's Mexico City office. "But if you don't recognize plurality and diversity, you can't be democratic."

Jews have been both welcomed and persecuted throughout Mexican history, as the country struggled with competing desires to attract immigrants for economic reasons and to maintain a cohesive society.

Jewish settlement in Mexico dates back to the Spanish colonization in the 16th century. But Mexico's Inquisition, although not as severe as Spain's, virtually eliminated the Jewish community.

Anti-Israel trend grows in European academic circles

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

An open letter to the British Medical Journal by a psychiatrist and human rights activist has called for the British Medical Association to withdraw from the World Medical Association because of the election of an Israeli as chair.

The Sept. 6 issue of the BMJ contained a letter from Derek Summerfield, a senior lecturer at the Institute of Psychiatry at King's College in London, that accused Dr. Yoram Blachar, the head of the Israel Medical Association (IMA), of complicity in alleged human rights violations.

Summerfield quoted a 1996 Amnesty International report that said Israeli doctors working with the security services "form part of a system in which detainees are tortured, ill-treated, and humiliated in ways that place prison medical practice in conflict with medical ethics."

He also pointed to a statement published last year in the Lancet, another British medical journal, in which Blachar said Israel was "under the constant siege of terror" and therefore forced "to grapple with complex ethical issues" easily dismissed by those not involved in the conflict. Human rights activists have argued the statement proves Israeli doctors are not conforming to the same ethical standards as the rest of the world.

Summerfield's statement comes at a time when many members of the Jewish community feel that the world is applying a double standard to the Middle East dispute and that Israel alone is being faulted for the conflict.

In a Sept. 8 letter responding to Summerfield, Blachar wrote, "[T]he IMA, and I as its head, oppose torture in any form."

Israeli soldiers "do the best they can to uphold human rights under very difficult conditions of constant terror attacks," he said.

"Nonetheless, when specific incidents are brought to our attention regarding apparent violations of neutrality or medical ethics, the IMA tries to clarify the incident with the appropriate party, be it the army, hospital directors or the prison services."

In a press release dated Sept. 13, Blachar further elaborated that "we as physicians are the advocates and partners of our patients and we want to send a clear and unambiguous message to all perpetrators of torture that we condemn this abhorrent practice.

"In addition, we have a role as social leaders, and in this capacity physicians need to denounce acts of torture which they become aware of in the course of their medical practice."

"We have also recently organized a course on human rights for military medical personnel, in conjunction with the Israel Defence Forces and the Association for Civil Rights in Israel," Blachar said.

In an open letter responding to Summerfield, also published Sept. 6 in the BMJ, the British Medical Association's director of professional activities, Vivienne Nathanson, emphasized the importance of "maintaining an inclusive international organization that seeks to influence medical associations positively by exposing them to best practices rather than excluding and isolating them."

Nathanson said while reports from organizations such as Amnesty International have specified problems in Israel, such reports also show that no country on earth has a blameless human rights record.

"Awareness among medical leaders… doctors will ultimately have a positive human rights influence in the communities in which they work," she wrote.

Some doctors feel that the effort to exclude Israeli physicians from the World Medical Association represents much worse than the application of a double standard. It blocks the free flow of information by intimidation and promotes an environment that discourages open debate.

The attempt to boycott Israel represents "a knee-jerk reaction that is surprising and shocking in the scientific community and gives credence to those who wish to demonize Israel and its policies as if they are responsible for the conflict," says Joel Sadovoy, a professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and president of the International Psycho-Geriatric Association.

Sadovoy said in disciplines such as medicine, where honest discussion is crucial, scientific leaders need to take great pains to inform themselves fully. When they allow their political motivations to guide their actions, prejudices are presented as if they're reality and legitimacy is given to the idea that entire scientific bodies can be censored by ejection from the academic community, he said.

In the meantime, many Canadian Jewish doctors say the boycott debate is taking place solely overseas.

Israeli physicians working in Canadian hospitals have not reported on any discrimination, says Rose Geist, a professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and president of the Canadian chapter of the Israel Medical Association, an organization that brings Israeli doctors to Canada for one or two-year terms.

After reading about the controversy, Geist questioned Summerfield's intentions in his letter, saying he uses non-critical, unsubstantiated evidence to demonize and alienate people and organizations as a form of education.

However, the effort to ostracize, exclude and excommunicate is an archaic and unethical tool that was used in the past to persecute people and inflict pain, Geist said.

Now, when Israelis are perceived to be under attack, she said, exclusion is clearly not the most ethical response to their plight.

"Boycotts serve no one's purpose," agreed Arnold Noyek, who is the director of the Isabel Silverman Canada-International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEBO), an umbrella organization that brings together Canadian, Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian doctors to work on health-care projects.

Health-care professionals have the ability to "defocus from the political" and come together to advance common goals. Doctors should be attempting to contribute to peace building in the region by breaking down barriers, not imposing them, Noyek said.

Suicide bombing 'justified'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

A well-published political science professor in the United States told an audience in Toronto recently that suicide bombing is justifiable in the Middle East conflict.

Ali Mazrui, the director of the Institute of Global Cultural Studies at Binghamton University, State University of New York, was the featured guest speaker Oct. 11 for the Ontario chapter of the Friends of Makere University in Uganda.

During his talk outlining the pros and cons of globalization and terrorism, Mazrui, who is originally from Kenya, said the downside to activism occurs when bystanders are hurt.

For example, he said, innocent Africans were killed in Kenya when they got in the way of "Al Qaeda radicals and Israeli diehards."

In a question-and-answer period, Mazrui said suicide bombing is an effective tool to use against Israelis. He added proudly that he is still one of the few Muslim professors who are still bold enough to say what they truly believe.

The young girl who committed suicide in Café Maxim in Haifa Oct. 4 would not have managed to kill so many Israelis had she simply attacked with a gun, said Mazrui, who is also the Albert Schweitzer Professor in the humanities and director of the Institute of Global Cultural Studies at Binghamton University.

Masrui's views are part of a growing intellectual trend that has emerged out of the current Middle East conflict. Its proponents include doctors, lawyers, writers and academics who advocate the use of murder and suicide as a means of political expression.

Adel Sadeq, the chair of the Arab Psychiatrists Association, head of the department of psychiatry at Ein Shams University in Cairo and recipient of the 1990 Egyptian State Prize, recently discussed suicide bombing on Iqraa, a Saudi-Egyptian satellite TV channel.

During his interview, which was translated by Middle East Media Research Institute, the doctor, who otherwise appeared to be an adherent to the hippocratic oath, glorified the notion of suicide bombing and the taking of Israeli lives as a concept impenetrable to the western mind, where the human soul is considered "most sublime."

"Only our culture understands sacrifice, loyalty and honour," Sadeq said.

"No one in the [western] world sacrifices his life for his homeland. If his homeland is drowning he is the first to jump ship."

But "in our culture it is different" because when a martyr dies, he reaches the height of bliss. When the martyr explodes, he knows that he is not dead. He is simply in transition to another, more beautiful world, because he knows very well that within seconds he will see the light of the Creator."

Sadeq also disagreed with the notion that killing Israelis is a crime against humanity.

"There are no Israeli civilians," he said.

No plan to kill Arafat, Sharon tells EU lawmakers

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said for the first time in public on Monday that Israel had no plans to kill Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

"I don't see any plans to kill him, although the man is responsible for the deaths of hundreds, of thousands of mostly civilians because his strategy is a strategy of terror," Sharon told a group of some 150 European parliamentarians visiting Jerusalem.

Israel has said it would seek the "removal" of Arafat, whom it accuses of fomenting violent attacks since the launch of a Palestinian uprising three years ago. Arafat denies the allegation.

Political sources had said Sharon had ruled out assassinating Arafat, but it was the first time the prime minister has done so publicly.

Cabinet members have talked openly of expelling Arafat, a former guerrilla leader who returned from exile as the head of the Palestinian Authority under 1993 interim peace accords.

The threat has drawn strong international opposition, including from the United States, Israel's main ally.

Israel Radio quoted Sharon as telling the lawmakers that Israel will agree to recognize a Palestinian state and, under the third stage of the road map peace plan, will be willing to discuss settlements, borders and security zones.

Sharon said that he wanted to implement goodwill measures toward the Palestinians, but that easing restrictions had led to more terror attacks in the past.

Sharon also told the lawmakers that every phone call made by a European leader to Arafat stalls the peace process.

The 150 members of the European Parliament were on a four-day Mideast mission that began Saturday with a quick visit to Amman, where they met with King Abdullah, Queen Rania and the speaker of Jordan's senate, Zaid Rifai.

They were to meet Monday with Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, but the meeting was cancelled at the last moment.

Austrian slave labour fund extends deadline

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Austria is giving Nazi-era forced labourers and slave labourers more time to apply for payments from its Reconciliation Fund.

Former forced labourers and slave labourers now have until Dec. 31 to apply for lump-sum payments that range from 7,630.65 Euros ($11,711) to 363.36 Euros ($558), depending on the claimant's wartime experiences.

The deadline was extended from Sept. 27 when fund administrators realized that many potential applicants remained unaware of the program, despite substantial public relations efforts, said Richard Wotava, secretary general of the Austrian Reconciliation Fund.

Since the fund's inception in December 2000, administrators have received 770 applications from Canada. Even in Austria, where the fund has been broadly publicized, "people only recently learned we exist," Wotava said. "If we get new cases in Austria, I'm 100 per cent sure we'll fund new applications, new cases in [Canada]."

More than one million forced labourers were deported to Austria during World War II to work in the country's factories and fields – even as domestics and in hotels – Wotava said. It is believed about 150,000 are alive today, and so far, the fund has identified 110,000 of the onetime forced labourers, paying out approximately $320 million (US).

While individual payouts are modest, the fund's purpose is not to offer full compensation or restitution for losses suffered. The goal is "to pay a symbolic and voluntary [sum] to forced and slave labourers who worked on the territory of what is today Austria," Wotava said.

Anyone who believes they are eligible for compensation are encouraged to contact the fund directly in Austria. Fund administrators acknowledge that most forced labourers do not possess documentation proving their claims, but Wotava assured applicants that "we are not bureaucrats. We want to help people get their small awards and small recognition."

Wotava noted that people deported to German-administered concentration camps, who were forced into slave labour, are not eligible, as these survivors are covered by a German-administered fund.

For more information, the fund can be contacted by mail at Post Box 44, A-1011 Vienna, Austria; by telephone at 43-1-5136016-0; by fax at 43-1-5136016-15; by e-mail at info@reconciliationfund.at. The fund's Web site can be found at: www.reconciliationfund.at.

Despite retreat, Iranian dossier remains open

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

A week before the expiration of the International Atomic Energy Agency's ultimatum to Iran demanding it sign an agreement to increase nuclear inspection and allow surprise inspections at all sites ("the supplementary protocol"), Tehran retreated from its refusal. Tehran has also agreed to the demand to cease production of the fissionable materials for the production of nuclear energy (enriched uranium and plutonium), even though it claims it has the right to produce them.

Because Iran has been caught out in a series of lies about its nuclear activities in violation of agreements it has signed, it is necessary to be on the alert and not allow for any procrastination in the implementation of its promise. But in any case, it will now be harder for it to continue to lie. Various intelligence services are now scrutinizing its every move. Israeli intelligence has played an important role in understanding what is happening in Iran behind the scenes.

The Iranians have retreated because of the fear of sanctions, economic pressures, increasing diplomatic isolation and perhaps a military strike. This retreat is an international achievement which, if realized, will perhaps have a positive effect on the suspicious nuclear activities of North Korea.

Three European states deserve kudos: Britain, France and Germany, which joined later after some debate. The Germans were hesitant until a laboratory found that samples taken from suspicious sites in Iran showed that Iran was enriching uranium to make it suitable for military needs.

For their part, the Russians acted cautiously with respect to the provision of the nuclear materials for operating the reactor they built at Busheir, while Japan cancelled a large plan to invest in the fuel industry in Iran.

The determining factor was British and French intelligence, which both concluded separately that Iran is advancing its production of atomic weaponry. European suspicions increased when they found out that Iran was also developing ground-to-ground missiles with a range of 2,000 kilometres, and another missile with a range of 5,000 kilometres. The British and French intelligence services asked why Iran needed expensive long-range missiles when they already had Israel in range with the Shihab 3, which reaches about 1,300 kilometres.

Before the three foreign ministers of Britain, France and Germany came to Tehran, the directors general of their ministries came to set forth their demands in detail. They did not simply demand that Iran sign the supplementary protocol, but also demanded that it not wait to carry it out until the ratification of the agreement in the Iranian parliament. It was clear that the elements in Iran who are pushing for nuclear weapons want to gain time. The Europeans and the Americans realized that such procrastination would in the end cause other countries in the region to turn to atomic weapons. The Europeans presented the Iranians with an economic plan as well as plans for the production of electricity if Iran accepts their proposal.

Even assuming that a nuclear turnaround is beginning in Iran, which is still doubtful, the matter is far from closed. Apart from the nuclear issue, there are two other sensitive issues pending in this file: the development of long-range ground-to-ground missiles that will threaten not only Israel or Saudi Arabia, but also Europe, and Tehran's involvement with terror.

Tehran is behind operational activities of such terror groups as Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, and it also sends money to Hamas. Its involvement in direct terror against Israel has increased, with representatives of the Revolutionary Guards working through Hezbollah with terror cells in Fatah's Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades in Samaria.

As is their wont, the Iranians were prepared to "do business" to put an end to terror, on condition that they would not be disturbed in their nuclear development. But those who negotiated with them did not fall into this trap. It is hoped that they will keep up the pressure on Tehran on the issues of terror and missiles as well.

Sari Colt barely survives her Jewish family

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The jury is still out as to whether Sari Colt will invite her family when she takes to the stage to for her one-woman comedy show Barely Surviving My Jewish Family.

Colt's family – her younger sister Dani and parents Betty and Neil – are anxious to see her skewer them with love. It's Colt who's not sure they should attend the Nov. 1 show.

"My parents have a very good sense of humour I inherited from them. The show is based on the truth, but with an element of exaggeration, just to make it more entertaining. That's what comedy is all about. I'm a bit nervous having them there. It took comedian Margaret Cho years before she could invite her Korean family to her one-woman show," says Colt, 36.

The Toronto-born and raised performer describes the play as a series of stories about growing up in what she calls her very unique Jewish family.

"I discuss how my family had a loaf of challah bread, which we continued to use every Friday night. After blessing it, we'd put it back in the freezer to use the next week… without even taking a bite. This ritual went on for a year. I suggested shellacking the bread to keep it from getting mouldy, but finally my mom bought a new one.

"In the show, I also talk about how my mom adores Sharon Osbourne, Ozzy's wife, because she's half-Jewish – not to mention her hair always looks fabulous; how my mom accidentally got herself a television commercial – meanwhile I've never been in one and I've studied acting for years; and how I discovered my Grade 1 Hebrew teacher had become a centrefold in a men's magazine," she says.

Colt has wanted to be in comedy since childhood. At the age of 14, she submitted a wish to be a teenage TV talk show host to the CTV's Thrill of a Lifetime, a show devoted to making dreams come true, and her dream came true in a very big way. She was flown to Vancouver to host an episode of the Alan Thicke Show and got to hang out with an unknown comic called Jerry Seinfeld.

Colt's career includes appearances on a number of top radio shows across North America and performances in clubs in Toronto and Los Angeles. She also wrote a satirical book poking fun at dumb blonde stereotypes called The Dumb Blonde Dick Shunary of Sex. Her comedic songs Bring Back Metal and My Cousin is a Redneck have earned airplay south of the border.

Colt hopes the Nov. 1 pay-what-you-can charity event in aid of the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation is just the beginning for Barely Surviving My Jewish Family.

"My hope is to find a producer who would like to get involved with the play so that I can perform it all over North America. I would love to be the next Nia Vardalos, who wrote and starred in My Big Fat Greek Wedding," Colt says.

Tickets to the show on Nov. 1 at 8 p.m are available at Centre for the Arts' door, 533 College St., Suite 303, on performance night, or by e-mailing rsvp@dkproline.com.

Sari Colt yearns for some fresh challah.

MULTI-MEDIA
PRESENTATION:

"Children of a Vanished World", Russian photographer Roman Vishniac's startling collection of Eastern European Jewish children between 1935 and 1939 will once again be on display as part of Holocaust Education Week.

This multi-media presentation directed by Judy Kopelow features over 70 of his photographs, projected onto a stage accompanied by Yiddish folk songs and narration.

It will be performed at Hart House Theatre, University of Toronto on Nov. 3 at 8 p.m. Following the performance, CBC's Evan Solomon and Joe Schlesinger will moderate a discussion with Leo Adler, director of National Affairs Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and Mara Vishniac Kohn, the photographer's daughter.

Tickets are $25 ($18 for seniors and students) from the box office (416-978-8668) or www. harthousetheatre.ca.

Author explores complex themes of second-generation survivors

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

With her fourth novel A Good Man, Toronto author Cynthia Holz has chosen a theme close to home by writing about Jewish characters struggling with how the Holocaust has shaped their lives and self-perceptions.

Published last spring by Thomas Allen, A Good Man is a study of the lives of Izzy Schneider and Phil Lewis, Toronto friends who had appreciably different experiences in the Holocaust. Wherease Izzy escaped, leaving behind his family in Berlin, Phil fought the Nazis in Poland as a partisan and became a war hero.

Izzy's conscience condemns him in later years for not having done enough, but Holz renders a far more balanced judgement. She also shows that someone who had emerged heroic from the Nazi cauldron can yet be deficient in major areas of character.

"My whole point is that these labels don't stick because they aren't appropriate," Holz told The CJN. "The truth is always much subtler. My feeling is that we're all in the middle ground, neither this nor that. People are complex and subtle and a mix of many things."

The story is literally triggered by the mysterious shooting death of Phil Lewis, who had operated a shirt factory, employing Izzy among many others. To Izzy, Phil was almost family, since his daughter Eva had married Phil's son Roger and produced a son. Attempting to gain insight into Phil and perhaps himself as well, Izzy begins an unofficial investigation into Phil's life.

Dark secrets of the gothic variety are not lacking among these characters, especially Eva. The author's intent seems to be to alleviate the heavy judgement Izzy makes against himself by showing that he actually accomplished much good and was, indeed, "a good man." Simultaneously, many unsavoury aspects emerge of the supposedly heroic Phil.

Set in Toronto and Florida in a time near the present, A Good Man avoids any scenic presentation of the Holocaust. Its theme concerns the continuing effects of that dramatic upheaval many years later upon the aging survivors and their children.

"It's a book that deals with the second generation – the guilt and the shame that the second generation carried even though they never went through the war," Holz said. "I didn't want to write a book that was directly about the Holocaust, partly because it's already been done. There are plenty of stories that need to be told about the second generation and how the history and the intense feelings of the Holocaust are carried on.

"Also, I wanted to address the story of someone who didn't go through the camps or the ghettos, and who left in time, and how he was not spared – it still wrecked his life. He carried enormous amounts of guilt and grief and shame. And I wanted to address the dislocation that comes with leaving your culture and your home and starting all over again."

In some ways, Izzy's story parallels that of Holz's father, who died five years ago, leaving behind a packet of letters from family members who perished in Europe. She would not have felt comfortable writing the book while he was alive, she said.

The New York-born author, who came to Canada in 1976 as a magazine correspondent and stayed, has previously penned Onlyville, The Other Side and Semi-detached, as well as the short-story collection Home Again. Her latest novel is the first in her oeuvre that deals with a Holocaust theme and in which the Jewishness of the main characters is not incidental.

"It's a departure for me, and it's where I'm going now with my work as I get older," she said. "As one gets older, one begins to question the meaning of life. I'm looking for deeper meaning and how we look at our world. I've always written about relationships but in this case I'm taking on three generations and a lot of historical stuff as well."

Holz reads from A Good Man during the Jewish Book Fair at Leah Posluns Theatre on Sunday Nov. 16, 1:30 p.m. She is also scheduled to read at Israel's bookstore in January.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

EDEET RAVEL, ANDREW COHEN, REGINE ROBIN AMONG NOMINEES FOR GOVERNOR GENERAL'S AWARDS

Eye on Arts delights in the extraordinary wealth and breadth of literary talent in this country, but derives a special naches from seeing Jewish names on prestigious lists such as the roster of nominees for this year's Governor General's literary awards.

In line for the top fiction award is Edeet Ravel, Montreal-based author of Ten Thousand Lovers, her first novel, about a woman who falls in love with an Israeli army interrogator. Ravel, who has already written a second novel as yet unpublished, competes with Margaret Atwood and three others for the $15,000 prize, to be awarded Nov. 12. (All nominees receive $1,000.)

Edeet Ravel

Nominated in the non-fiction category is Ottawa writer Andrew Cohen for While Canada Slept: How We Lost Our Place in the World (McClelland & Stewart). The book offers a cogent analysis of how Canada slipped from its place as a respected middle power that can reconcile the differences of bellicose nations.

Montreal author Regine Robin is in the running in the French-language non-fiction category for La mémoire saturée, an investigation into the duty to remember the Holocaust and other historical catastrophes of the last century. Robin's novel The Wanderer won the coveted fiction prize at the Canadian Jewish Book Awards in 1998.

Montrealer Yolande Amzallag was nominated for her translation from English into French of The Ethical Canary: Science, Society and Human Spirit by Margaret Somerville. And David Homel was nominated, along with Fred A. Reed, for their English translation of Monique Proulx's Le coeur est un muscle involontaire (The Heart is an Involuntary Muscle).
